V. 20—24. The Jews, when scattered among the Gentiles, appeared to them an abject and wretched company of people. They were noticed as the worshippers of JEHOVAH wherever they went: but they were looked upon as a viler race than any of the idolaters among whom they were driven: and having been carried captive out of their own land, and reduced to a miserable slavery by their enemies, JEHOVAH was despised and blasphemed, as if he had been unable to protect his worshippers, and as if there had been no profit in serving him. For many of the Gentiles would ascribe their wickedness to the tendency of that religion, which they abhorred; and not to their having acted inconsistently with it: and they would regard their miseries, not as the punishment of their sins, but as proofs that their God was not able to protect them. Thus the name of JEHOVAH was profaned; and this reproach must have rested upon it, had he suffered his enemies finally to prevail against his people. He was therefore determined to show mercy on them, from regard to the honour of his own name; though there was nothing in their characters to induce him to it. By their reformation he meant to wipe off the dishonour cast upon him by their wickedness: and by gathering them from among the nations, and restoring them to their own land, he intended to glorify his power, truth, and goodness; and to show himself superior to all the idols of the nations, in the sight of their devoted worshippers.

V. 25—27. In allusion to the divers washings and sprinklings of the ritual law, the Lord promised "to "sprinkle clean water on his people, and make them "clean from all their filthiness and idols." Clean water is the universal purifier of our persons, garments, houses, streets, and cities: and under both the Old Testament and the Christian dispensation, it hath been used as an emblem of the cleansing of our polluted souls from sin. But no water, however clean, or in what mode soever it be applied, can do more than take away "the filth of the "flesh:" except as it is used for an outward sign of the inward and spiritual grace of the Gospel. Water is especially the sacramental sign of the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit; yet this is always connected with the atoning blood of Christ. When the latter is applied to the conscience, through faith, to cleanse it from dead works; the former is always applied to all the powers of the soul to purify them from the love and pollution of sin: and thus the sinner is "washed, and sanctified, and jus-"tified in the name of our Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit "of our God." Accordingly it is here promised, that the Lord would cleanse both the land and the souls of the people from the guilt and pollution of their wickedness and idols; from the filthiness before mentioned, (17,) which had made them loathsome to him, and rendered a separation necessary. What next follows has before been explained; (Notes, xi. 19, 20. xviii. 30—32. Jer. xxxii. 38—41:) but it is here added, that the Lord "would put his own "Spirit within them." Having prepared their hearts by his grace, he would dwell in them by his Spirit: and thus holy affections and dispositions being produced, preserved, and continually invigorated by his blessed influence, they would walk in his statutes, and observe and keep his commandments. These blessings would be given them for this purpose, and the Lord would thus efficaciously cause them to do so. But of whom was this spoken? Doubtless many of the Jews, who returned from Babylon, were thus renewed and sanctified: yet numbers of them continued strangers to such special blessings, though preserved from outward idolatry. These promises indeed are pleaded by all true believers, in every age, and fulfilled to them: and this may be called the spiritual meaning. But the context speaks so expressly and repeatedly of the house of Israel being restored to the land which the Lord had given to their fathers, that, in the prophetical meaning, I apprehend, it greatly confirms the opinion of those who suppose that, after the Jews shall be converted to Christ, they shall also be restored to their own land. Then these promises will be fulfilled to them in their fullest meaning; and the subsequent part of the prophecy will be literally accomplished, in the sight of all the nations: and the Jews are no doubt preserved a distinct people, on purpose to make way for this great display of the Lord's power and truth, and thus to demonstrate to all the world the divine original of the holy Scriptures. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 30. Though Canaan is now become a "barren "land, for the wickedness of those who dwelt therein:"

31 Then [q] shall ye remember your own evil ways, and your doings that were not good, and [r] shall loathe yourselves in your own sight, for your iniquities, and for your abominations.

32 Not [s] for your sakes do I this, saith the Lord GOD, be it known unto you: [t] be ashamed and confounded for your own ways, O house of Israel.

33 Thus saith the Lord GOD; In the day that I shall have cleansed you from all your iniquities I will also cause you [u] to dwell in the cities, and the wastes shall be builded.

34 And the desolate land shall be tilled, [x] whereas it lay desolate in the sight of all that passed by.

35 And [y] they shall say, This land that was desolate is become [z] like the garden of Eden; and the waste, and the desolate and ruined cities are become fenced, and are inhabited.

36 Then the heathen that are left round about you shall [a] know that I the LORD build the ruined places, and plant that that was desolate: [b] I the LORD have spoken it, and I will do it.

37 Thus saith the Lord GOD; [c] I will yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them; [d] I will increase them with men like a flock.

38 As the * holy flock, [e] as the flock of Jerusalem in her solemn feasts, so shall [f] the waste cities be filled with flocks of men: and they shall know that I am the LORD.

yet the Lord can easily render it more fruitful than ever; and thus silence the reproach before spoken of, (13—15.) Many understand this and some of the following verses, of the great success of the Gospel in the predicted times.

V. 31. (Note, xvi. 60—63.) If we consider this passage as a prediction of the conversion of the Jews to Christ, and their restoration to their own land; the iniquities, which they shall especially remember with self-abhorrence, must mean their obstinate rejection of the Messiah, and their long-continued opposition to his cause, and all their other sins as resulting from that unbelief. (Note, Zech. xii. 10—14.)

V. 32. 'The prophet repeats this, on purpose to 'check the vain presumption in the Jews, and confidence 'of their own merit; a fault they have been prone to in 'all ages.' (Lowth.) The extreme care of the inspired writers, in using all means of keeping alive a sense of guilt, and exciting a spirit of deep contrition, even when delivering the most free and enlarged promises of rich mercy, is a most instructive subject of meditation, especially to the ministers of the Gospel.

V. 36. 'He declareth, that it ought not to be referred 'to the soil, or plentifulness of the earth, that any country 'is rich and abundant; but only to God's mercies: as his 'plagues and curses declare, when he maketh it barren.'

V. 37. Though the Lord would do these things freely for his own name's sake, and not for any merit or excellency of the people, (as they were always disposed to imagine:) yet he would have them to plead this promise with him, inquiring about the time and manner of its accomplishment, and earnestly begging of him to perform it: and he intended to pour out the Spirit of grace and supplication upon them, that they might be excited thus to inquire of him to do it for them. (Notes, Zech. xii. 6—14.) Then Jerusalem and the cities of Judah would be replenished with multitudes of inhabitants, like those who thronged thither to the solemn feasts; rapidly increasing in number, as well as living harmoniously and inoffensively, like flocks of sheep. This may signify the increasing number of worshipping congregations, all over the land, and in every part of the earth, in those happy days that were predicted. 'He will dispose their hearts to apply 'themselves to him by prayer, and will answer the petitions, for the fulfilling these his promises.' (Lowth.)

V. 38. Some understand by "the holy flock," the sheep and lambs designed for sacrifice at the solemn feasts: but perhaps the assembled worshippers are meant. (Ps. c. 3.) (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—15.

The most sacred truths, ordinances, and works of God, and every person or thing which relates to him, are taken up in the lips of profane talkers; who divert themselves and each other, and gratify their pride and malice, by endeavouring to represent that as despicable and infamous which God hath pronounced holy, honourable, and excellent. Such scoffers triumph and boast upon every apparent success, as if they had swallowed up the Church, and she were become a derision and a prey to her enemies: and their alacrity and joy in their successful efforts against her are increased, when they can gratify their covetousness, as well as malice, by these despiteful persecutions. But if in this manner they provoke the Lord to jealousy, he will return upon them the contempt and affliction which they have caused to his people; and punish them for their impious and scornful words, as well as for their unjust and cruel behaviour towards his servants. For, though the truth and cause of God may be run down, they cannot be kept down: the mountains of Israel, however wasted, profaned, or forsaken, will again be peopled, cultivated, and rendered fruitful: yea, the Lord is with his people, who then can be against them? And the time is at hand, when he will purify and settle his Church, and replenish her with numerous converts, and do better for her than even in the beginnings of the Gospel-dispensation. Then will he silence the calumnies, cavils, and objections of the ungodly: every part of the word of God will appear to all men consistent with facts; and the whole history of mankind shall show the truth of the Scriptures, the excellency of our holy religion, and the happiness of the people of God.

V. 16—27.

When we consider the abominations that have prevailed in the visible Church, we shall not wonder that the Lord hath repeatedly put away one part or another of it, with abhorrence and indignation; but shall rather admire at his patience and mercy, in still maintaining his cause amidst such multiplied provocations: and when we compare his justice and holiness with our guilt and pollution, and recollect how we have defiled ourselves and all his good gifts, by our evil ways and doings we shall often be amazed, that he hath not ere this poured out his fury upon us, and punished us according to our deservings. But the glory of his own great name always supplies him with motives for doing good to his people: and even when he cuts off hypocrites and apostates, and severely corrects his offending children, he will not have his honour profaned among his enemies, by letting them wholly trample down his worshippers; so that he will render his cause triumphant in the event. Not that he will connive at the sins of those who are called by his name; for this would still more embolden the blasphemies of ungodly men: but he will save his people from all their sins: and when he separates them from the company of those that perish, he will also "redeem them from all iniquity, and purify them unto "himself a peculiar people zealous of good works." Indeed he finds us all "foolish, disobedient, deceived, slaves "to divers lusts and pleasures," and polluted with those abominable things which he loathes and abhors: but when "the loving kindness of God our Saviour towards us is "made manifest, he saves us by the washing of regene-"ration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he "pours upon us abundantly through Jesus Christ our "Lord." These blessed influences, like purifying water, then bedew and cleanse all the powers of our souls; and our being cleansed from all filthiness, and from the love and power of every sin, and detached from idolatrous affections for every created object, proves our interest in the blood of sprinkling, and shows that our sins are forgiven. When the Lord speaks and says, "I will, be "thou clean," the leprosy of our depraved nature is cleansed: he who first created our souls can new-create them to holiness, now that sin hath marred their beauty and ruined their health. He gives all his believing people a new heart, and puts a new spirit within them: the heart of stone is then changed for a heart of flesh, and becomes susceptible of every holy affection: then they are influenced in a proper manner by his word and providence: and the blessed Spirit of God, dwelling in his new creatures, as a Teacher, Sanctifier, and Comforter, gently leads them to walk, with increasing liberty and delight, in all his ordinances and commandments.

V. 28—38.

Our God is ever ready to fulfil his most precious promises to every one who perceives his need of them, and their suitableness to his case, and who pleads them by prayer in the name of our glorious Advocate: and thus the most polluted and inveterate transgressor may become a humble, holy, and spiritual worshipper and servant of God; one meet to be numbered with his people, and to enjoy his favour as his all-sufficient and eternal Portion. And when the Lord thus saves men from all their uncleannesses, he will supply all their wants, and cause every event to concur in doing them good. A humble disposition of mind, leading a man frequently to remember his evil ways with loathing and self-abhorrence, and cordially to confess his unworthiness of the least mercy, even whilst he expects the richest blessings from the abounding grace of God, is an essential and inseparable concomitant of the new heart and spirit bestowed on true believers. Nor is there any more decisive proof that a man is yet in his sins, than a disposition to justify himself, and to expect the divine favour as the reward of his own goodness. The Lord will make it known to all the heirs of salvation, and that in proportion to their growth in grace, that "boast-"ing is for ever excluded," that shame and misery are all that such sinners can deserve; and that they are saved to the praise of the glory of his grace and for the honour of his great name. This conviction prepares them for every duty on earth: and when they shall come to glory, it will induce them to cast their crowns before the throne, and to ascribe salvation to God and to the Lamb for evermore. In some of these promises, the Lord, as it were, passes by, and says to the sinner, "Wilt thou be made clean?" 'Ask me, and I will cleanse thee;' and so waits to be inquired of by them to do these things for them; and to do them more and more perfectly for believers: others of them invite us to pray for the increasing purity, prosperity, and spread of true religion. He waits to be inquired of by his people to fulfil these prophecies, and to fill the earth with his holy flock and with the congregations of his saints. Let us then give ourselves unto prayer, and turn all these promises and predictions into petitions and supplications: and thus seek increasing holiness, fruitfulness, and comfort to our own souls, and expect more glorious times for the Church of God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVII. V. 1—10. The predictions of the preceding chapter, taken in their fullest sense, seemed very unlikely and almost impossible to be fulfilled, considering the ruined and dispersed state of Judah and Israel. The prophet was therefore shown in a vision, by what power and in what way they would be performed. Under the influence of the prophetic Spirit, he was carried in a vision into the midst of a valley full of human bones; like those places in which great battles had been fought and vast multitudes slain, who had been left unburied till the flesh was all consumed, and the bones were dried, divided, and scattered about. When he had gone round and carefully surveyed these bones, and found them very many and very dry; the marrow from within, as well as the flesh from without being utterly wasted; the Lord inquired of him "Whether these dry bones could live?" To which he answered with a proper mixture of humility and faith, "LORD, thou knowest." No created power could restore them to life: but if God should please to put forth his power, they might be raised from the dead and live. The Lord then ordered him to prophesy upon these bones; to predict their resurrection, to call upon them to hear his word, and to speak over them the promises that follow, concerning their being reunited, and restored to life, that they might know his power and Godhead. This would appear even a more hopeless service, than to prophesy the restoration of Israel to their ancient prosperity, or to preach to the most hardened sinners: yet he started no objections, but obeyed his orders. And whilst he was speaking, he seemed, in his vision, to hear a noise, and to see a great commotion among the bones; for behold, they were, so to speak, every one of them in quest of its kindred bone, and, under the divine direction and influence, each speedily found its proper place, and was jointed to those bones that belonged to the same body, till the whole were formed into a vast number of complete skeletons; and then sinews, flesh, and skin covered them, and they became entire human bodies, but without life. The prophet was next ordered to prophesy to the wind, and to command it, in the name of the Lord, to blow from the four quarters of the heaven upon these slain men, that they might live: and whilst he obeyed his orders, they were restored to life, and he was surrounded with a vast army. The wind seems to have been the emblem of the Spirit of God, the Author and Giver of life: and the same original word signifies both wind, breath, and the Spirit. This therefore represented the prophet's calling upon God by his Spirit to quicken these dead bodies, that by his power they might become living men. The whole vision was an instructive emblem of the power of God operating by means, which of themselves must be entirely inefficacious, and thus producing most stupendous effects.

V. 11. The dry bones, indeed, aptly represented the ruined and desperate condition of both Israel and Judah: yet the language which they used was that of unbelief mingled with impatience; second causes seemed to give them no prospect of deliverance; and they overlooked the great first Cause of all: they therefore considered the state of the nation to be as desperate as that of these dead bones.

V. 14. When Cyrus issued his proclamation, the Lord, as it were, opened the graves of the house of Israel; and when he stirred up their spirits to embrace the proffered liberty, he put his Spirit into them, that they might live; and their re-establishment in their own land evinced the truth of God in the prediction, and his power in its accomplishment. 'That principle of life expressed by 'breath or spirit, (9.) not excluding that new Spirit of 'grace, which God will at that time plentifully bestow 'upon them. The principle of grace is often spoken 'of as a higher principle of life, and the earnest of our 'heavenly inheritance.' (Lowth.) The vision was evidently intended, in its primary meaning, to encourage the desponding Jews; and to predict both their restoration after the captivity, and also their recovery from their present long continued dispersions. But it was also a clear intimation of the resurrection of the dead; and it likewise represents the power and grace of God in the conversion of the most hopeless sinners to himself.

V. 15—19. The prophet was next ordered to take two sticks, or small pieces of wood, and to signify by writing, that the one was the emblem of Judah, and those of the other tribes that had joined themselves unto them under the government of the house of David; and that the other was the emblem of the tribes of Ephraim, Manasseh, and the several tribes which formed the kingdom of Israel. These he was directed to join together, that they might become one stick in his hand. When he did this before the people they would conclude that he had some prophetic meaning in it, and inquire whether he would not inform them of it: and he was ordered to show them, that the Lord would unite the two kingdoms by his power, and in consequence of their union with him. Their disunion had greatly weakened them, and their furious contests had made vast havoc of both; and thus they became a prey to their common enemies. But it was here predicted, that they should be united and established together in the service and favour of God. This was partially accomplished after the Babylonish captivity; when all the Israelites, that returned with the Jews from Babylon, settled under the same government and formed with them one nation. But it is probable that there will hereafter be a more remarkable accomplishment of it. It may also be considered as an emblem of the union of the Jews, Israelites, Samaritans, and Gentiles in the Church of Christ, being all made one by their union with him, their common Head; and an intimation of a more entire harmony among professing Christians, than had yet taken place. 'Ezekiel foretold 'many things by signs; and the Jews were very inquisitive 'into the meaning of them: though sometimes their 'curiosity proceeded rather from a secret contempt of the 'prophet and his predictions, than a real desire of information.' (Lowth.)

V. 20—22. 'Thou shalt place the sticks thus joined 'together before their eyes, as a visible token and pledge 'of the truth of what I enjoin thee to speak to them in 'the following words.' (Lowth.) It is plain, that the times of the Gospel were here especially intended: for it was promised, that both Jews and Israelites should be gathered into their own land, and become one nation under one King, and that that King should be David (24:) but they were never governed, as one nation, by any king to whom the name of David could properly be given, from the time of the captivity to the coming of Christ, who is several times called David. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 23. The Lord here promised, that he would deliver

24 And [m] David my servant shall be king over them; and they all shall have [n] one Shepherd: [o] they shall also walk in my judgments, and observe my statutes, and do them.

25 And [p] they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt; and they shall dwell therein, [q] even they, and their children, and their children's children for ever: [r] and my servant David shall be their prince for ever.

26 Moreover, [s] I will make a covenant of peace with them; it shall be an everlasting covenant with them: and I will place them, and [t] multiply them, [u] and will set my sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore.

27 My [x] tabernacle also shall be with them: yea, [y] I will be their God, and they shall be my people.

28 And [z] the heathen shall know that I the LORD do [a] sanctify Israel, when my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for evermore.

Israel from all the places where they had been living in sin; and bring them into his Church as true believers, both justified and sanctified; that they might be his people, and he the Object of their worship and the source of their felicity.

V. 25. This cannot possibly be interpreted of any events, that took place before the coming of Christ: and after his coming, the Jews were soon driven from their own land, and have never regained possession of it. Yet the language is so expressive, that it seems plainly to mean, that the Jews should dwell in Canaan under the rule of Christ, from the time intended, through all generations to the end of the world.

V. 26. 'God will be reconciled to them through 'Christ, and admit them into that covenant of peace, of 'which he is the Mediator.' (Lowth.)

Set, &c. This signifies, that the Lord would establish his true religion and accepted worship, (of which the sanctuary had been so long the centre,) in Israel, when reinstated in the promised land. 'Here he promises his pre-'sence among them, by the graces of his Spirit and the 'efficacy of his word and sacraments.' (Lowth.)

V. 28. The nations of the earth shall witness God's peculiar favour to Israel, and powerful interposition in behalf of that nation, according to his promise: and this probably will be the means of bringing them to believe the Scriptures, and to embrace Christianity.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—14.

As the Almighty power of God is engaged to perform his whole word; so our objections and doubts, arising from difficulties or apparent impossibilities, are the offspring of ignorance and unbelief. That omnipotent word, which once spake this fair creation into existence, and still upholds it; and which shall hereafter call forth from their graves the innumerable millions of the dead, to a life of endless happiness or misery, must be sufficient to remove all obstacles, and effect all purposes, that form a part of the divine plan. On this power ministers must absolutely depend when they preach the Gospel: for the state of those that are dead in sin and enmity against God, slaves to Satan and their own lusts, and habituated to various evils, is as desperate in itself, and they are as much without strength as these dry bones were: nor could any created power restore them to God and holiness. But the true minister has some experience of "the exceeding "greatness of that mighty power which wrought in "Christ, when he was raised from the dead," and which hath wrought and still worketh in every believer: and he knows it to be sufficient to soften the hardest and cleanse the most polluted heart. When he therefore considers the case of proud infidels and Pharisees, or of abandoned profligates and blasphemers; the Lord as it were asks him, Whether these dry bones can live? Whether they can be made his saints and servants? And his answer is, "LORD "thou knowest." If he please to work, the dry bones will live: nor can we make any exception to this rule, without limiting the power of our God. But though the work be wholly his; yet he commands us to use means: and if he ordered us to preach to the dry bones in a charnel-house, it would be our wisdom and duty to obey: and only pride and unbelief could start objections. If sinners then were as devoid of life and sense as the dry bones, we ought to preach to them, and to call on them to hear the word of the Lord, and to set before them his truths, invitations, and promises; warning, exhorting, beseeching, and persuading them to come to Christ for salvation; and to hope that God would powerfully work, whilst we were using the appointed means. But the incapacity of sinners, though equally entire, is of another kind; they are rational creatures, whose understandings, consciences, affections, and imaginations may be addressed, and who are capable of fears, hopes, and desires. Surely then we should be ready at the Lord's command to go to the highways and hedges, in order to invite and even compel men to come in, as far as arguments and persuasions can do it; to beseech rebels to be reconciled to God, and to command them to repent and believe the Gospel; accompanying all our endeavours with earnest prayers, that the Spirit of God may come and breathe on dead sinners, that they may live. Under this kind of preaching various effects will be produced: many will be made to tremble, and to inquire what they must do to be saved? And a great commotion will sometimes be excited among those who have been careless and secure: there will be a gathering of the people to hear the word, and to confer about the matters of religion: numbers will be induced to attend on the means of grace; and even those who eventually are converted, often do many things outwardly before they are actuated by a vital inward principle. We should indeed be careful not to rest in any thing short of true conversion; and we should warn the people not to settle in forms, notions, or external reformation: yet this shaking among the dry bones may encourage us to proceed, preaching earnestly, praying fervently, and waiting patiently: and we may hope in due time to see a large company of spiritual soldiers, warring under the banner of Christ, against sin, the world and the devil, raised up from those who before were dead in trespasses and sins. Let us also remember, that the same power is equally engaged to raise the Church from her lowest depressions, and our souls from the deepest discouragements; and to perform all that for us and ours, which is truly good for us. Our part is to use proper means, to wait and pray, and not to yield to discouragement, because of difficulties, as if our hope were lost, or we were cut off, when our trials are heavy, and our prospects gloomy. But let us look to him, who will at last open our graves and bring us forth to judgment, that he may now deliver us from sin, and put his Spirit within us, and keep us by his power through faith unto salvation: then we shall at last come forth victorious from all our conflicts, and for ever bless God for our present sharpest tribulations.

V. 15—28.

Nothing hath so hindered the success of the Gospel hitherto, as the divisions among professed Christians: and it requires the same power of God to unite discordant persons and parties, so that they may be one in his hand, as is requisite to raise his Church from the most discouraging situation. They who desire the prosperity, should labour and pray for the peace of Jerusalem: and in this sense especially, "Blessed are the peace-makers, for they "shall be called the children of God." We have all one King and Shepherd, and are all one nation and family; nay, one body, as united to Christ our Head: how unnatural for us then to be as two armies, fighting against and weakening each other! Let us study "to keep the "unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace:" let us with one accord seek for divine grace, to keep us from any more defiling ourselves with our idols, detestable things, or any transgressions: let us pray that the Lord would in like manner cleanse his Church; that he may be known among the nations, as the Sanctifier of Israel: let us thank him, that he hath set his tabernacle among us, by his Gospel and appointed ordinances; and beg of him to continue it in the midst of us for evermore; and that he would also place it again among his ancient people the Jews, and vouchsafe it to all other nations of the earth: that this everlasting covenant of peace may be with them, as well as with us: that we may altogether be the obedient and happy subjects of the Son of David; and that the Lord may be our God, and we his people for evermore.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVIII. V. 2. 'The prophecy, con-'tained in this and the following chapter, without ques-'tion relates to the latter ages of the world, when the 'whole house of Israel shall return into their own land.—'Gog, the land of Magog; or "of the land of Magog." 'Magog was the son of Japheth. (Marg. Ref.) From 'whence the Scythians are generally supposed to be de-'rived. The Mogul Tartars are still called so. By Gog 'and Magog, may most probably here be meant the Turks. '—The land of Canaan has been, for several years, in the 'possession of the Turks. The people here called Gog, 'and their allies, will attempt to recover it again out of 'the hand of the Jews. This may, probably, occasion 'the war and victory here spoken of. The Septuagint 'takes the word Rosh, commonly translated chief, for a 'proper name: so they render the sentence thus; "The "prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal." 'ROSH, taken 'as a proper name, signifies those inhabitants of Scythia, 'from whence the Russians derive their name and origi-'nal.' (Lowth.) It is not indeed agreed what people or transactions are here predicted: but it seems evident, that they are not yet accomplished. Nothing occurred in the wars waged by the Syro-grecian kings against the Jews after the captivity, or in their conflicts with Antiochus Epiphanes, that answers to these predictions: and it is foretold, that these events would be fulfilled in the latter days. It is therefore probably supposed, that the accomplishment will be posterior to the conversion of the Jews, and their restoration to their own land: and that the Turks, Tartars, or Scythians, from the northern parts of Asia, perhaps uniting with the inhabitants of some more southern regions, will make war upon the Jews, and be cut off in the manner here predicted. Gog and Magog are mentioned by St. John, (Rev. xx. 8, 9.) It is probable that the inhabitants of the same regions are intended; but different events are evidently predicted: for that assault of Gog and Magog will follow the millennium, and happen just before the general judgment; but this rather refers to the times that will introduce the millennium. Gog seems to be the name of the prince, Magog of his land or people.

V. 4. The ruin of these formidable enemies is thus intimated, by the prediction of their assault. They will certainly be induced to make this formidable invasion: and then God will defeat it, as he did that of Sennacherib, by putting his hook in their jaws, &c. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6, 7. 'Gomer was Japheth's son, and Togarmah 'the son of Gomer; these are thought to be they that 'inhabit Asia Minor.' 'The Persians from the east, the 'Ethiopians from the south, the Moors from the west, 'and the Phrygians from the north, shall join with them 'in this onset.' (Bp. Hall.) This is an ironical exhortation to Gog to make all possible preparation, and to use every precaution to defend himself and his army, and to insure victory: and it intimates, that God will thus gain the greater honour by his defeat.

V. 8. The expressions of this verse lead our thoughts far beyond the times of Antiochus Epiphanes; and the land of Israel having been "always," or perpetually, "waste," denotes a much longer desolation, than that of the Babylonish captivity.

—Always waste. 'Long in a state of desolation; namely 'first by the Assyrians, Babylonians, Antiochus Epi- 'phanes and the Romans: lastly, and at this time, by the 'Turks.'

V. 9. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. The Lord foresees from ages and generations, every thought, good or bad, that will ever come into the mind of any of his creatures, and every purpose of their hearts; and all these infinitely numerous apparent contingencies form a part of his immense and glorious plan.

V. 11. The converted Jews will live in peace and holy confidence in God, without attempting to molest others, or fear of being molested: they will therefore have neither walls, gates, nor bars; and this will tempt these depredators to invade them.

V. 13. (Marg. Ref.) 'These merchants, as soon as 'they heard of this intended invasion, came into Gog's 'camp, as to a market, to buy both persons and goods, 'which should come into the conqueror's power. Their 'chief merchants, who are described as so many princes, '(Is. xxiii. 8.) are called lions, because of the injustice 'and oppression they too commonly practised in their 'commerce.' (Lowth.) 'One enemy shall envy ano- 'ther, because every one shall think to have the spoil of 'the church.'

V. 14. 'As soon as the news of their being settled in 'their own country comes to thy knowledge, thou wilt 'certainly make preparations to invade them.' (Lowth.) riding upon horses, a great company, and a mighty army:

16 And thou shalt come up against my people of Israel, [l] as a cloud to cover the land; [m] it shall be in the latter days, and I will bring thee against my land, [n] that the heathen may know me, when I shall be sanctified in thee, O Gog, before their eyes.

17 Thus saith the Lord GOD; Art thou he, [o] of whom I have spoken in old time * by my servants the prophets of Israel, which prophesied in those days many years, that I would bring thee against them?

18 ¶ And it shall come to pass at the same time, when Gog shall come against the land of Israel, saith the Lord GOD, [p] that my fury shall come up in my face.

19 For [q] in my jealousy, and in the fire of my wrath have I spoken, [r] Surely in that day there shall be a great shaking in the land of Israel;

20 So that [s] the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the heaven, and the beasts of the field, and all creeping things that creep upon the earth, and all the men that are upon the face of the earth, shall shake at my presence, and the mountains shall be thrown down, and the † steep places shall fall, and every wall shall fall to the ground.

21 And [t] I will call for a sword against him throughout all my mountains, saith the Lord GOD: [u] every man's sword shall be against his brother.

22 And [x] I will plead against him with pestilence and with blood; and I will rain upon him, and upon his bands, and upon the many people that are with him, [y] an overflowing rain, and great hailstones, fire, and brimstone.

V. 16, 17. The exact accomplishment of these ancient prophecies will turn to a testimony to the nations that shall witness them: and they will recollect, that thus it was written, and thus it had come to pass. 'This signal victory 'over Gog and his associates, shall be the means of bring-'ing infidels to give glory unto me.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)—'The expressions here used plainly imply, that 'there was to be a succession of ages between the publish-'ing of these prophecies, and this event foretold by them. (Lowth.)

V. 19, 20. At the terror of the Lord's judgments upon the invaders; all nature will be, as it were, thrown into convulsions at his presence, and concur in executing his vengeance on them.

V. 21—23. 'God's decrees are expressed by his speak-'ing the word and giving out the command.' (Lowth.) Some think that the Lord will send assistance to Israel, by the armies of Christian princes: in addition, however, to all external opposition, he will occasion discord among the invaders, and they shall destroy one another; as well as perish by pestilence, hail-stones, fire, and brimstone.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When the Lord most effectually works to promote his cause, and to prosper his church in unity and purity: Satan will be most busy, (if permitted,) in exciting his servants, with combined efforts, to oppose it: and they who on other occasions are most hostile, often confederate to fight against his people. But, he whose all-seeing eye penetrates the deepest recesses of the human heart, through long series of ages, yea, from eternity; and who foresees what things will come into men's minds, and what evil thoughts they will think, is equally able to disappoint their devices. In vain do men prepare for the defence and success of themselves and their companions, when the Lord is pleased to fight against them; for "though hand join in "hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished."—They who enjoy the Lord's protection are safe, and may be secure, though they have no other defence. It is most atrocious to devise mischief against those who serve God, in quietness and honesty, and who are harmless, inoffensive, and unsuspecting. But the love of riches, and the hatred of God and holiness, incite men to the most base and destructive enterprises: and when any dwell securely, bad men soon know of it, and mark them as their prey. Hence, alas! it is become necessary for those communities that desire peace, to learn and encourage war as a science and a trade! All opposition to the cause of God will eventually tend to sanctify his great name, and to fulfil the writings of his ancient prophets; and that in proportion as it is formidable. They, who love to terrify their neighbours, will be made to tremble at the power and indignation of the Lord. The whole creation will concur in the destruction of his devoted enemies: nay, they will help forward their own and each other's ruin, till they are driven by the tempest of his jealousy into the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone; and thus he will be magnified and sanctified upon all those who refuse to submit to him and serve him.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIX. V. 2. Leave, &c. Or, "I will "strike thee with six plagues." (Marg. xxxviii. 22.) It seems probable, that none of the invaders will escape the general destruction: but perhaps the inhabitants of Magog in general are meant. The vast army of Gog, led forth to invade Israel will almost empty the land, and the subsequent judgments of God, upon those that remain at home, will reduce them to the sixth part of the whole. (6.)

And I will, &c. 'The words may be better translated, 'After I have caused thee to come up." &c. (Lowth.)

V. 6. Some terrible judgment will destroy those countries, whence the army of Gog was led forth; about the same time that the army itself shall be cut off. "They "that dwell carelessly in the isles," may denote the allies of Gog before mentioned. (xxxviii. 5, 6. 13.) 'I will 'send my fierce judgments upon the enemy of my Church; 'and upon those that being separated and guarded by 'the sea, live securely confident of their safety.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 7. 'I will not suffer my name to be dishonoured 'any more; nor let it be said among the heathen, that I 'was not able to rescue my people out of the hand of their 'enemies.' (Lowth.)

V. 8. This was predicted many hundred years before the event: yet the prophet spake of it, as already come and done, to denote the certainty of it; and as seeing in vision its actual accomplishment. 'The plague is fully 'determined in my counsel and cannot be changed.' 'It 'is the last and finishing stroke of God's justice upon the 'enemies of his Church.' (Lowth.) That is, before the millennium. (Note, xxxviii. 2. Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. The language here used, seems to imply, that the army of Gog will be cut off by miracle, as that of Sennacherib had been: for the people are described, as going forth, not to fight and conquer, but merely to gather the spoil. The immense destruction of the invaders is illustrated by the (perhaps hyperbolical) circumstance of the weapons found among the slain, serving for fuel during seven years, at least to the inhabitants of the adjacent cities. But when it is considered how little fuel, comparatively, is needed in warm climates; we may even conceive of this being literally fulfilled. The Israelites, however, will neither reserve these weapons for their own use, nor form them into trophies of their victory: but use them for fuel. 'In token that such a lasting peace 'should ensue, that there should be no more need of 'warlike preparations.' (Lowth.) It is supposed, that this prediction will be fulfilled just before the millennium; at which happy period, "men shall every where beat their "swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning "hooks; nation shall not rise against nation, neither shall "they learn war any more." (Notes, Is. ii. 1—5. Rev. xx. 1—6.)

13 Yea, all the people of the land shall bury them; and it shall be to them [u] a renown, [x] the day that I shall be glorified, saith the Lord GOD.

14 And [y] they shall sever out men of ‡ continual employment, passing through the land to bury with the passengers those that remain upon the face of the earth, [z] to cleanse it: after the end of seven months shall they search.

19 And ye shall eat fat till ye be full, and drink blood till ye be drunken, of my sacrifice which I have sacrificed for you.

20 Thus [g] ye shall be filled at my table with horses and chariots, with mighty men, and with all men of war, saith the Lord GOD.

21 ¶ And [h] I will set my glory among the heathen, and all the heathen shall see my judgment that I have executed, [i] and my hand that I have laid upon them.

22 So the house of Israel shall [k] know that I am the LORD their God from that day and forward.

23 And [l] the heathen shall know that the house of Israel went into captivity for their iniquity: because they trespassed against me, therefore [m] hid I my face from them, and [n] gave them into the hand of their enemies: so fell they all by the sword.

24 [o] According to their uncleanness, and according to their transgressions have I done unto them, and hid my face from them.

25 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; [p] Now will I bring again the captivity of Jacob, and have mercy upon [q] the whole

V. 11—16. Gog will expect to seize the whole land of Israel for his army and people: but the Lord will only give them a place of graves in some part of it; and not even that, till their bodies have lain some time unburied. The multitudes of the slain will infect the air with their stench, and cause the travellers to stop their noses; or they will lie in the way, and obstruct those that are passing on the road. So that the Israelites must bury them, though they had neither trouble nor peril in vanquishing them. This will be the work of seven months to all the people of the land; that is, of all such as can be spared from other needful employments. But it will be necessary in order to cleanse the land. No doubt the prophet referred to the ceremonial law in this passage; though that law will not be regarded when this prediction shall be fulfilled: but it will be also needful to cleanse the land from the natural defilement, which might otherwise cause an infection.—This labour of Israel will bring great honour to them, as well as redound to the glory of God. 'The valley, near 'this sea, (of Gennesareth,) is called "the valley of the "passengers;" 'because it was a great road, by which the 'merchants and traders from Syria, and other eastern 'countries, went into Egypt. All the people shall be em-'ployed seven months in burying the dead; and after they 'are ended, particular persons, appointed for that purpose, 'shall make a clear riddance.'

A sign, &c. 'A stone, or some mark of distinction, 'that men may avoid passing over them.'

Hamonah. 'This is probably meant of a city that 'should be afterwards built near this valley, and called 'Hamonah, to perpetuate the memory of such a transac-'tion.' (Lowth.) No such city, however, has yet been built, of which we have any account.

V. 17—20. 'It was the custom for persons that 'offered sacrifice, to invite their friends to a feast, that 'was made on the remainder: so here the prophet, by 'God's command, invites the beasts and fowls to partake 'of the sacrifice of his enemies slain; they are called a 'sacrifice, because offered up as an atonement to God's 'justice.' V. 23—29. These verses seem to refer to this and all the preceding prophecies, concerning the restoration and subsequent prosperity of Israel. They went not into captivity to Babylon, because the Lord was unable to protect them, or through any breach of his promise; but because of their transgressions, which provoked him to hide his face from them, and to leave them in the hands of their enemies. In like manner they were expelled from the land by the Romans, and continue in a captive or exiled state to this day; because they rejected and crucified Christ, and pertinaciously fought against his Gospel: and he hath dealt with them accordingly. But when he shall at length have mercy on the whole house of Israel, by converting them to Christianity for the glory of his own name; and when they shall have borne the shame of being cast off for their sins, while they dwelt safely in their own land, and shall again be gathered into it: then the nations shall perceive his justice, truth, and goodness in his dealings with his people, and shall learn to know, worship, and serve him: and Israel also shall know the Lord their God, in a humbling spiritual manner, as revealed in and by Jesus Christ, whom they have so long rejected. At that time they shall all be gathered into their own land: and the Lord will no more hide his face from them, or leave them in the hand of their enemies, as he will have poured out his Spirit upon them, and thus made them his holy worshippers and servants. The return of a few Jews from Babylon, and their continuance, increase, partial reformation, and prosperity, till the days of Christ, followed by their present long continued dispersion, under the frown of God, and destitute of his Spirit, could in no wise answer to these predictions. We are therefore constrained either to explain them exclusively of the blessings conferred on the Church at large; or to conclude that some future events, exactly answerable to them, shall take place in respect of the nation of Israel: and this latter interpretation is far more consistent with the most obvious method of explaining the Scriptures.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

The Lord will surely make all men, even the most careless and inveterate transgressors, know his holy name; either by the power of his righteous indignation, or by the riches of his mercy and grace: and he will at length silence every objection to his dispensations, and not suffer his holy name to be polluted any more. This time is at hand: this is, as it were, already done: the day of which God hath spoken is about to be ushered in; his promises and judgments will soon be exactly accomplished: let us then go forth to meet him, and anticipate by faith and prayer the approach of his promised blessings to ourselves and to his Church. Speedily the weapons of war, which are so much in use all over the world, will be rendered needless. Indeed they might now be all burned, or buried in the depth of the sea, to the great benefit of mankind; and they would be thus disposed of, did not men more resemble Satan in pride, malice, and treachery, than the Lord in justice, truth, goodness, and mercy; and if they did not take more delight in robbing, murdering, or domineering over others, than in love and good works. Yet it is the common lot of spoilers to be spoiled and slaughtered, by those whom they seek to injure. After all the disturbance that is made by men of vast ambition or insatiable avarice, and after all their mighty expectations and achievements, a place of graves is all that the Lord gives them on earth; and sometimes even this is denied, that the indignities exercised towards their dead bodies may be an emblem of the contempt and misery to which their guilty souls are doomed in the invisible world. It is our duty to show a humane disposition even towards the most injurious: yet self-love may suffice to induce the survivors to bury the dead. It should therefore moderate our regard to these mortal bodies, and their decoration and indulgence, and our attention to external accomplishments in others, to consider, that commonly, in two or three days after death, the human body becomes too deformed a spectacle to be looked on without horror by those who used most to love and admire it. When the Lord is glorified in the ruin of his enemies, and in the good conduct and prosperity of his people, it becomes a day of great renown to them: but it is the chief renown of any land, when all ranks and orders of men concur in cleansing it from the filthiness of sin, which is far worse than any natural or ceremonial pollution whatever. This is a good work, which will require persevering diligence, that it may not be done superficially, but that search may be made into the secret recesses of iniquity, by persons severed for that service, and with the assistance of all that are able to give them information.

V. 17—29.

The most haughty and prosperous of sinners are only fattened for the slaughter, like the bulls and rams of Bashan; at length they will all be made a sacrifice to justice, for the display of the glory of God, before the nations of the earth: whilst the poor and afflicted people, that trust in him, shall certainly know and experience his power, truth, and love, in their timely deliverance and advancement. But even the professed people of God often fall into the hands of their enemies, or into divers and sore calamities; because they have trespassed against him, and he deals with them according to their uncleanness and their transgressions. And indeed, if true believers yield to temptation, and commit deliberate wickedness, the Lord will hide his face, and inflict sharp correction on them; and they will walk in darkness, and their enemies will seem to insult over them. But though they may thus be deserted, tempted, corrected, and distressed; yet they have a sure refuge in the Lord's mercy: for a season they bear their shame; till being truly penitent, he again hath mercy on them, for the honour of his own name; and then they dwell safely and comfortably under his protection, and none can make them afraid. For the name of God will finally be hallowed: his cause will be triumphant on earth, and in heaven: he will yet have mercy on the dispersed house of Israel, and gather them out of their captivity: and he will never finally hide his face from any of those on whom he hath poured out his sanctifying Spirit. But we must not expect to be wholly exempted from temptation, distress, and trouble, till we come to heaven: then we shall be filled with the Spirit of holiness, and behold the face of our God, without one frown or intervening cloud for evermore.

NOTES.

CHAP. XL. V. 1. (Marg. Ref.) The prophet had this vision in the most gloomy season of the captivity, twelve years before Jehoiachin was released from prison by Evil-merodach.

V. 2. (Note, i. 1.) The vision, contained in the remainder of this book, is allowed by commentators to be one of the most obscure in the sacred Scripture: so that it is not fully agreed what city, temple, and land were intended; or whether it had reference to former or to future times; whether it be understood literally or figuratively; whether it relate to the Church on earth, or that in heaven. Some think the following description of the temple was intended to show what Solomon's temple had been, (Notes, 1 Kings vi. vii.) others explain it of the second temple, and of the city, after they were rebuilded and arrived at their greatest prosperity. There can, indeed, be little doubt, that the grand outlines of the description were taken from Solomon's temple, with all the additions made to its courts and outbuildings in after ages; and that in many particulars it may be considered as a model of it, when destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar. We may also suppose, that Zerubbabel, Joshua, and the other Jews, had respect to it, as far as circumstances would permit, in rebuilding the temple after the captivity. There are, however, several circumstances, which conclusively show, that something vastly superior to either the first or second temple was intended; and that the external description must be considered as a figure and emblem of spiritual blessings. This will appear, in many particulars as we proceed: but especially the dimensions of the temple, city, and land; and the division of the land to the prince, priests, and tribes; and the river of water springing from the threshold of the temple, enlarging till it reached the dead sea, and sweetening its waters; with the trees growing on the banks of the river, bearing fruit every month, cannot be literally interpreted, or made to accord with any thing which has yet taken place, (xlv. xlvii. xlviii.)—'The general scope of Ezekiel's temple is, by giving a 'promise of restoring Solomon's to preserve the Jews 'from defiling themselves with idolatry during their captivity; and when the time of that should be expired, to 'encourage them to go home and rebuild their temple, 'and observe the laws and ordinances prescribed by Moses, 'for performing God's worship there; which yet was 'never to be equal to Solomon's in every respect, before 'the Messiah should come, whose Church should resemble 'Solomon's temple, in symmetry and beauty, in firmness 'and duration, in a regular, orderly, and decent worship 'of the true God; and in the manifestation of the divine 'presence, at first by the miraculous gifts of the holy 'Ghost, and ever since by the inward assistances, com-'forts, and protection of the same Spirit.' (Lowth.)—The state of the Church, however, in that happy period which we are taught to expect, seems to be emblematically predicted. 'Nothing is more usual, than for the prophets 'to describe the state of the Christian Church, by repre-'sentations taken from the Jewish temple and service.' (Lowth.) (Notes, Is. xlix. lx. lxvi.) If we would judge of the propriety, with which those glorious days were pre-

3 And he brought me thither, and, behold, there was a man, [k] whose appearance was like the appearance of brass, [l] with a line of flax in his hand, and a measuring reed; and he stood in the gate:

4 And the man said unto me, Son of man, [m] behold with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears, and set thine heart upon all that I shall shew thee; for to the intent that I might shew them unto thee art thou brought hither: [n] declare all that thou seest to the house of Israel.

5 And, behold, [o] a wall on the outside of the house round about, and in the man's hand a measuring reed of six cubits long, [p] by the cubit and an hand breadth: [q] so he measured the breadth of the building, one reed; and the height, one reed.

6 ¶ Then came he [r] unto the gate * which looketh toward the east, and went up [s] the stairs thereof, and measured the [t] threshold of the gate, which was [u] one reed broad; and the other threshold of the gate, which was one reed broad.

7 And every [x] little chamber was one reed long, and one reed broad; and between the little chambers were five cubits; and the threshold of the gate by the porch of the gate within was one reed.

dicted under such allusions; we must place ourselves in the situation of the pious Jews, when in captivity, who favoured the very dust and stones of their city and temple; and who could not well detach their ideas of the Church's prosperity, from that of the external splendour of the sanctuary; or conceive of more glorious times for the worship of God, abstracted from the expectation of a larger temple or city. It is probable that the more immediate accomplishment of the prophecy will be subsequent to the conversion of the Jews, their restoration to their own land, the destruction of Gog and Magog, and the pouring out of the Spirit mentioned in the close of the foregoing chapter: and it will perhaps continue through the thousand years, during which Satan will be chained up in the bottomless pit. But whether there will be any external forms, analagous to those here predicted, cannot be determined; though in some respects it seems very improbable: it is, however, absurd to attempt laying down rules for Church-government, discipline, or modes of worship, from so obscure a vision: seeing men of lively imaginations and contrary sentiments may, perhaps, with equal plausibility, accommodate it to their systems. In general the vision seems to have been intended, both to remind the Jews of what they had lost by their sins, and so to lead them to repentance; and to encourage their hopes of the final prevalence of that cause, which was at that time so greatly depressed.

A very, &c. 'Mount Moriah is called "a very high "mountain," "because it represents the seat of the Chris-"tian Church, foretold by the prophets, that it should be "established on the top of the mountains." 'Mount 'Moriah lay southward of the hill of Zion, though north-'ward of the lower part of the city, commonly called Je-'rusalem.' (Lowth.) The very high mountain, however, is not said to have been Moriah or Zion. The prophet saw on the south, the frame, or plan, of the city, which would at length be builded, and which he afterwards repeatedly mentioned; though he was directed first to describe the courts and the temple.

V. 3. A man, &c. Many suppose this man to have been the eternal Son of God, anticipating his incarnation by appearing in human form. He is the Builder, as well as the Foundation and Corner-stone of the spiritual temple: and his appearance as brass might denote his durable stability and glory, in his person and mediatorial government: yet, as the glory of God, in Christ, has been shown to be the scope of the introductory vision, (Notes, i. x.) and as the same glory appeared to the prophet in this vision, when the man here spoken of was present, (xliii. 1—6:) it may be questioned, whether he were not a created angel, (Rev. i. 15.) 'The use of the line was to measure 'the land; and of the reed to take the dimension of the 'buildings.' (Lowth.) These may denote his revealed word, or secret decrees, according to which he will regulate every thing that relates to the doctrine, worship, and practice of his Church.

V. 4. 'He proposes to the prophet two duties, always necessary: that he should diligently learn from God, and faithfully deliver what he had received.

V. 5. A wall. This wall is supposed to have surrounded the temple and all its out-buildings; and it may be an emblem of the Church's separation from the world, and its security under the divine protection. The reed, with which the prophet's Instructor measured, is computed to have been nearly four yards long: though some think that the ordinary Jewish cubit is meant, and distinguished from that which was used in Chaldea; and that the reed was not much above three yards long. The outward wall is stated to have been one reed in breadth, or thickness, and one in height.

V. 6. The gate of the outward court, in which the Israelites worshipped, seems to be intended. 'The Angel 'passes by the court of the Gentiles, and does not measure 'it: (Rev. xi. 2;) perhaps signifying, that the multitude 'of the nations, flowing into the Church, could not be 'comprised in any measure or number.' 'The word 'translated threshold, signifies the lintel, or upper part of 'the door case, as well as the lower threshold.' (Lowth.) These were equal in dimensions to the thickness of the wall.

V. 7. The entrance into the outward court seems to have been through a porch, with doors at both ends; and on each side of this porch were three small chambers, or rooms, a reed square in size, with a passage of five cubits between them. 'These rooms were for the use of the 'porters, that took care of the several gates, which led to 8 He measured also the porch of the gate within, one reed.

9 Then measured he the porch of the gate, eight cubits; and [y] the posts thereof, two cubits; and the porch of the gate was inward.

10 And [z] the little chambers of the gate eastward were three on this side, and three on that side; they three were of one measure: and the posts had one measure on this side and on that side.

11 And he measured the breadth of the entry of the gate, ten cubits; and the length of the gate, thirteen cubits.

12 The * space also before the little chambers was one cubit on this side, and the space was one cubit on that side: and the little chambers were six cubits on this side, and six cubits on that side.

13 He measured then the gate from the roof of one little chamber to the roof of another: the breadth was five and twenty cubits, door against door.

14 He made also posts of threescore cubits, even unto the post of [a] the court round about the gate.

15 And from the face of the gate of the entrance, unto the face of the porch of the inner gate were fifty cubits.

16 And there were † narrow windows to [b] the little chambers, and to their posts within the gate round about, and likewise to the ‡ arches: and windows were round about § inward: and upon each post were [c] palm-trees.

17 Then brought he me into [d] the outward court, and, lo, [e] there were chambers, and a pavement made for the court round about: [f] thirty chambers were upon the pavement.

18 And the pavement by the side of the gates over against the length of the gates, was the lower pavement.

19 Then he measured the breadth from the fore front of the lower gate [g] unto the fore front of the inner court

'the temple.' (1 Chr. ix. 18—24. xxvi. 12—18.) 'The 'inward threshold, at the further end of the porch, look-'ing into the first court, was of the same size with the 'outer one.' (Lowth.)

V. 8. Or, "He even measured," &c.

V. 9. "The porch of the gate," and "the posts "thereof," seems to have been a partico, or pent-house, on the inside of the entrance beyond the chambers, projecting eight cubits, and supported by posts or pillars, two cubits in circumference; which carried off the wet, and served for shade and shelter, to those who entered into the outward court.

V. 10. (Note, 7.) 'The fronts of the doors, belong-'ing to each row of chambers, were of the same size. (Lowth.)

V. 11. The width of the gate, or door, at each end of the entrance, (perhaps including the door-posts,) was ten cubits; and the height thirteen cubits, or about twice the height of the wall.

V. 12. A space of a cubit in width, seems to have been separated by some rail or fence on both sides, from the passage, before each of the little chambers; to keep off the throng of those who entered into the court, and perhaps for a passage to those who occupied the rooms. (7.)

V. 13. The whole arch of the east-gate, measured from the southern extremity of one room to the northern extremity of the opposite room, was twenty-five cubits: including the dimensions of the two rooms, (or twelve cubits;) the spaces before the rooms, (or two cubits:) and the breadth of the entrance, (ten cubits.) This makes twenty-four cubits; and the other cubit seems to have been taken up by the walls of the rooms, inward, towards the entrance. The doors of the rooms on each side the entrance seem to have faced each other.

V. 14. The word, rendered posts and post is by many supposed to mean pent-houses. Perhaps, the verse may signify, that the pent-houses to the chambers, and within the porch toward the court, when the several measures were added together, amounted to sixty cubits in extent.—The angel is said to have made, what he delineated before the prophet.

V. 15. 'The whole length of the porch, from the 'outward front, unto the inner side which looks into the 'first court, was fifty cubits. Twelve, the thickness of 'the wall at each end; eighteen for the three chambers on 'each side; and ten cubits for the space between the cham-'bers; allowing the same space between the chambers on 'each side, and the two walls.' (Lowth.)

V. 16. 'Every one of the little chambers had a narrow 'window to it, toward the inside of the gate where the pas-'sage was; and so there was over the side posts or fronts, '(or pent-houses,) placed at the entrance of each chamber.' 'These were broad within, to disperse the light, and nar-'row without.' (Lowth.) The arches seem to have been built above each door, with a window in them; as it is generally practised in many cities at present. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17. "The outward court" was within the porch above described; but without, or more distant from the temple than the inner court. It is supposed to have been surrounded by cloisters, or porticos, with a pavement under them; and over these were chambers, for the use of the priests and Levites; or rather for storehouses, in which to preserve the sacred oblations.

V. 18. Perhaps there was a pavement between the porticos on each side, facing the entrance called the lower pavement, because the pavement on each side, under the porticos, was raised higher than this was.

V. 19. The distance between the inner door, into the outward court, and the door at the other extremity into the inner court, was a hundred cubits. The way to the temple was a continued ascent; so that the door into the inner court was the higher, that into the outward, the lower, gate. The width of this part of the court from south to north was the same as the length from east to west. At least this seems the most obvious construction of the concluding words.

V. 20. The north-gate, into the outward court, which is next described, was made nearly, if not exactly, in the same manner as the east gate, &c.

V. 21, 22. (Notes, 13. 15, 16.)

Before them. Or, 'suitable to them; that is, to those 'of the east-gate.' (Lowth.)

V. 23. (Note, 19.) 'The north-gate of the inner court 'did exactly answer this north-gate of the outer court: and 'in like manner the east-gate of the inner court answered 'the east-gate of the outward court.' (Lowth.) 'The 'gate of the inner court was over against the gate, (that is, of the outward court,) 'as well on the north side as on 'the east.

V. 24—27. (Marg. Ref.) It seems there were no gates on the west; though the courts may be supposed to have extended, by the sides of the temple, to the western wall: at least the square, at first described, within the surrounding wall, would admit of this, (5.)

V. 28. The outward court enclosed the inner, on the east, north, and south sides. Thus the prophet was led from the south-gate of the outward court, to the south-gate of the inner, which was over against it; and so into the inner court itself.

V. 29—31. (Notes, 8—15.) The entrance into the inner court seems to have been through a portico, like that at each gate of the outward court, with little rooms for porters, and spaces between, of the same dimensions, and with a pent-house towards the outward court: but the ascent was by eight steps; whereas the outward court had but seven. 'The fifteen Psalms from the hundred and 'twentieth, called Songs of degrees, or ascents, are sup- 'posed to have been sung on some of these steps.' The arches, (30,) are supposed to have been built, over the spaces which separated the porter's lodges; and to have been twenty-five feet in height.

thereof, were according to these measures: and there were windows therein and in the arches thereof round about: g it was fifty cubits long, and five and twenty cubits broad.

34 And the arches thereof were toward the outward court; and palm-trees were upon the posts thereof, on this side, and on that side: and the going up to it had h eight steps.

35 ¶ And he brought me i to the north gate, and measured it according to these measures.

36 The k little chambers thereof, the posts thereof, and the arches thereof, and the windows to it round about: the length was fifty cubits, and the breadth five and twenty cubits.

37 And l the posts thereof were toward the outer court; and palm-trees were upon the posts thereof on this side, and on that side: and the going up to it had eight steps.

38 And m the chambers, and the entries thereof, were by the posts of the gates, n where they washed the burnt-offering.

39 And in the porch of the gate were two tables on this side, and two o tables on that side, to slay thereon p the burnt-offering, and q the sin-offering, and r the trespass-offering.

40 And at the side without, * as one goeth up to the entry of the north gate, were two tables; and on the other side, which was at the porch of the gate, were two tables.

41 Four tables were on this side, and four tables on that side, by the side of the gate; eight tables, whereupon they slew their sacrifices.

42 And the four tables were of hewn stone for the burnt-offering, of a cubit and an half long, and a cubit and an half broad, and one cubit high: whereupon also they laid the instruments wherewith they slew the burnt-offering and the sacrifice.

43 And within were † hooks, an hand broad, fastened round about: and s upon the tables was the flesh of the offering.

44 ¶ And without t the inner gate were the u chambers of the singers in the inner court, which was at the side of the north gate; and their prospect was toward the south; one at the side of the east gate, having the prospect toward the north.

45 And he said unto me, This chamber, whose prospect is toward the south, is for the priests, x the keepers of the ‡ charge of the house.

46 And the chamber whose prospect is toward the north is for the priests, y the keepers of the charge of the altar: z these are the sons of Zadok, among the sons of Levi, a which come near to the LORD to minister unto him.

47 So he measured the court, b an hundred cubits long, and an hundred cubits broad, four square; and the altar that was before the house.

48 And he brought me to the c porch of the house, and measured each post of the porch, five cubits on this side, and five cubits on that side: and the breadth of the gate was three cubits on this side, and three cubits on that side.

V. 48, 49. The length of the porch was the same as the breadth of the temple; that is, twenty cubits. Two doors of three cubits wide, opening each way, seem to have formed the entrance; these with five cubits on each side, called "the post of the porch," amount to sixteen cubits; and the other four cubits may be supposed to have been the distance from these posts to the outside of the walls of the temple. The breadth of the porch, in Solomon's temple, was only ten cubits, or half the length; but here it is represented as eleven cubits. The ascent from the inner court into the temple was by steps; and there were two pillars as in Solomon's temple. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In the depth of the tribulations of the Church and of believers, the Lord commonly gives some distant glimpses of approaching deliverance and comfort, to support their faith and patient expectation. The great builder of our spiritual temple, whose power and glory are infinite and eternal, always works by rule: and whilst he performs his secret counsels, he requires us to compare all our works with the standard of his word. This we should study carefully, that we may be fellow-workers together with him; and that our worship and obedience may be regulated by faith, and not by fancy or carnal wisdom. We should, therefore, "behold with our eyes, and hear with our ears," and set our heart upon all that the Lord showeth us; attending to the whole revelation of his will, and seeking the teaching of his Spirit; that we may be thoroughly furnished for every good work; and, if employed as ministers, may be able to declare the whole counsel of God to the people. Every part of scripture is divine, useful, and important, in different ways, or to divers persons; but it may not all be so immediately useful to us: others have had, and others will have, the benefit of some portions, which are to us not so intelligible or full of instruction. But if we cannot understand, or edify by any part of scripture, we should humbly acknowledge our own ignorance, and adore the divine wisdom and knowledge; and not allow ourselves to start objections on that account. Yet as some portions are more clear, and, to us at least, more important, than others: so a fondness for the study of the obscure parts in preference to the obvious, and for the tything of mint and cummin, above the weightier matters of the law, is a folly and a temptation sometimes even of godly men. The Church of God and all Christians are separated from the world, and protected by God; they are built on an immoveable foundation, and exalted in excellency and privilege above the nations of the earth; and they are continually and gradually ascending towards the Sanctuary above. A small chamber in this true temple is preferable to the most magnificent palace of the wicked: how glorious then must be the many mansions prepared in heaven for the disciples of Christ! There are even now great numbers of the churches of the saints; yet we may hope and pray, for their immense increase in numbers, and in grace and peace. They are all supported and sheltered by omnipotence: they have their measure of light, through ordinances and instruments, from Christ the Light of the world, by which they may walk and work comfortably: but it is not sufficient to gratify the thirst of knowledge of those who cannot be content to see through a glass darkly. Into these churches men have access as living members by faith in Christ; there they flourish as the palm-tree, by communion with God and his people; and they shall at length be made more than conquerors. The nearer we approach to God in profession or office, the more spiritual we should be. This will be best effected by daily looking to, and feeding on, our great Sacrifice, 'by faith in our 'hearts with thanksgiving:' nor should we be slack to commemorate His death, who hath "washed us from our "sins in his blood, and made us kings and priests to God;" that we may here in the courts of his temple ripen for our removal to the sanctuary above, there to rejoice in his love and glorify his name for evermore.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLI. V. 1. 'By the posts are meant the 'door-cases on each side of the entrance, (xl. 48.) These 'were six cubits thick, on the north and south sides: 'the same thickness had the upper lintel over the door. 'The word rendered tabernacle, sometimes signifies cover-'ing. In this signification it may not be unfitly applied 'to the upper lintel, which is a kind of covering to the door.' (Lowth.) Some understand the verse of penthouses, in the front of the porch, on each side, six cubits wide, with a covering of the same dimensions.

V. 2. The door out of the porch into the sanctuary seems to have been wider than that out of the court into the porch. (Note, xl. 48, 49:) but the whole length of the porch is still made out to be twenty cubits, perhaps including the side-walls. The dimensions of the first sanctuary, and of the most holy place, accord with those in Solomon's temple. (4. Marg. Ref.)

3 Then went he inward, and measured the post of the door two cubits; and the door six cubits; and the breadth of the door seven cubits.

4 So he measured the length thereof, [d] twenty cubits; and the breadth twenty cubits, before the temple: and he said unto me, [e] This is the most holy place.

5 After he measured the wall of the house six cubits; and the breadth of every [f] side-chamber, four cubits, round about the house on every side.

6 And the side-chambers were three, * one over another, and † thirty in order; [g] and they entered into the wall which was of the house for the side-chambers round about, that they might ‡ have hold; but they had not hold in the wall of the house.

7 And § there was an enlarging, and a winding about still upward to the side-chambers; for the winding about of the house went still upward round about the house: therefore the breadth of the house was still upward, and so increased from the lowest chamber to the highest by the midst.

8 I saw also the height of the house round about: the foundations of the side-chambers were [h] a full reed of six great cubits.

9 The thickness of the wall, which was for the side-chamber without, [i] was five cubits; and that [k] which was left was the place of the side-chambers that were within.

10 And between the chambers was the wideness of twenty cubits round about the house on every side.

11 And the doors of the side-chambers were toward the place that was left, one door toward the north, and another door toward the south: [l] and the breadth of the place that was left was five cubits round about.

12 Now the building that was before [m] the separate place at the end toward the west was seventy cubits broad; and the wall of the building was five cubits thick round about, and the length thereof ninety cubits.

V. 3. The partition wall, between the sanctuary and the holy of holies, is supposed to have been two cubits in thickness: the breadth of the wall on each side the gate seven cubits; and the entrance six cubits in width.

V. 5, 6. Six cubits. 'The thickness of the wall from 'the foundation; the first story of the side-chambers.' (Lowth.) The lower side-chambers in Solomon's temple were five cubits wide. (Note, 1 Kings vi. 5, 6.) 'At five 'cubits height from the ground, the wall which supported 'these outward chambers abated of its thickness one cubit; 'and there was a rest or ledge of one cubit's breadth, on 'which the ends of each story were fastened:—but they 'were not fastened in the main wall of the house.' (Lowth.)

V. 7. 'So much of breadth was added to the side-cham-'bers, as was taken out of the thickness of the wall; so that 'the middle story was one cubit, and the upper story two 'cubits, larger than the lower rooms. And winding stairs, 'which enlarged as the rooms did, went up between each 'two chambers, from the bottom to the top: and there were 'two doors at the top of each pair of stairs, one opening into 'one room, and the other into that over against it. By 'the house is meant these chambers three stories high.' (9.) (Lowth.)

V. 8. This may mean, that the prophet from the upper chamber had a view of the height of these buildings, which surrounded the temple: and considering the rests as a part of the foundation on which they were supported, it was a full reed, or six large cubits. (xl. 3.)

V. 9. This seems to be meant of the outward wall, which enclosed the side-chambers. The dimensions are large: but the whole structure was erected to be very strong and durable. The space of five cubits is thought by some to have been allowed as a walk before the chambers. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. A different word is here used for chambers than before: and some suppose that another row of buildings, at twenty cubits distance from the side-chambers, is intended. There was a row of chambers joined to the temple; and another row of buildings, parallel with them, with a passage of ten or eleven yards in breadth between them, besides the place that was left, before spoken of, (9.) But the description, and the various explanations of different commentators, are very obscure: and probable conjecture seems all that can be attained to on the subject.

V. 11. 'The doors of the lower rooms opened into the 'void space between the chambers.' (Lowth.) This was the case both of those chambers which were on the south-side, and those on the north-side, of the temple. Perhaps all the doors faced this void place; an area from the stairs leading to it on each side.

V. 12. It has been supposed that there was a row of buildings on the south and north sides of the temple, (besides the side-chambers,) with a space of twenty cubits between: and perhaps some building was erected on the west end of the temple, seventy cubits wide and ninety long, with a wall five cubits thick. Some, however, understand the verse of a wall, which was continued from east to west, on the outside of all the buildings before-mentioned, by the sides of the temple, to the extent of 13 So he measured the house, an hundred cubits long; and the separate place, and the building, with the walls thereof, an hundred cubits long;

14 Also the breadth of the face of the house, and of the separate place toward the east, an hundred cubits.

15 And he measured the length of the building over against the separate place which was behind it, and the * galleries thereof on the one side, and on the other side, an hundred cubits, with [n] the inner temple, and the porches of the court;

ninety cubits, and at the west end, to seventy cubits.—From north to south is called its breadth, as it corresponded with the width of the temple; from east to west its length, as it was parallel with the length of the temple.

V. 13—15. These verses seem to mean, that the temple, with the buildings and spaces above described, occupied an area of a hundred cubits square.

V. 16. (Marg. Ref.)

From, &c. 'He measured from the ground up to the 'windows of the temple, which were placed above the 'side-chambers. The windows were covered, either be-'cause the side-chambers hindered their being seen in the 'inner court; or else they were covered on the inside with 'curtains drawn before them.' (Lowth.)

V. 17. 'The windows were placed above the height 'of the door, at the east end of the temple; and were 'continued at measured distances, at the same height along 'the wall, on both sides to the wall of the inner sanctu-'ary; in which there were no windows.' (Lowth.) The windows on the out-buildings seem likewise to be included, which were placed at regular distances, and made in exact proportion.

V. 18—20. (Marg. Ref.) 'The Cherubim had four 'faces: but only two of these appeared in the carved 'work; the other two faces, that of an ox or eagle being 'supposed to be hid in the plain or surface of the wall.' (Lowth.) The two faces, which were most conspicuous, seem to be intended.

Up to above, &c. That is, to the windows.

V. 21. 'The lintels, both of the temple and the inner 'sanctuary, were not arched, but square; with a flat beam '—laid on the top of the side-posts.' (Lowth.)

V. 22. "The altar of wood," must signify that on which incense was burned. The dimensions are here much larger than those mentioned in Exodus; but that made by Solomon is supposed to have been larger than that made by Moses. Both of these, however, were covered with gold: and it is very remarkable, that in this temple described by Ezekiel, there is not the least mention made of gold or silver; though there was such a profusion of these metals, both in the tabernacle made by Moses, and in Solomon's temple. (Marg. Ref.) Does not this imply, that a glory of a more spiritual nature was intended under these emblems? Thus the glory of the second temple was greater than that of the first, because honoured by the personal presence of Immanuel.

This, &c. Some suppose, that the altar of incense is here called a table, because of the incense laid upon it, and presented to God: and others that the table of shew-bread was pointed out to the prophet, when his Instructor said, "This is the table," &c. May not an intimation be here given, that under the New Testament, a table would be substituted for the altars of the Old Testament, in that ordinance, by which we are admitted to the nearest communion with our God and Father?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When we carefully improve our instructions concerning the introductory parts of religion, we shall be led forward by our great Teacher into the interior parts of divine truth; that we may go forward in knowledge, wisdom, and experience, till we arrive in the most holy place above. The spiritual building, which the Lord is erecting, will prove both eminent and durable: our standing in the grace of God will be firmer, and our views and hearts more enlarged, in proportion as we mount upward in our affections and conversation: and all the windings and intricacies of a Christian's path still lead him upward. The peace and enlargement of the Church, and the believer's comfort and growth in grace, commonly make progress together. The cause of God gains ground gradually amidst all revolutions, under every dispensation: the boundaries of the Church were vastly extended by the first preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles: but they will be much more enlarged, when the Jews shall be converted, and all nations shall do service to the great Redeemer.—We have fellowship with angels in our employment and felicity, in proportion as we grow devoted to the service of our God and Saviour. Prudence, affection, and fortitude should unite with fervency, in all our services. The ordinances of God have hitherto been rendered more simple and spiritual: the table of the Lord has succeeded to altars and sacrifices; and the worship of God in spirit and truth, and the beauty of holiness, to the burdensome rites, and costly ornaments of the old dispensation. We should therefore endeavour to grow more simple in our dependence, and in our intentions and pursuits, and more spiritual in our affections and worship; for these times evidently mark the progress of the Church and every believer, towards the perfection of the heavenly world.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLII. V. 1. This is, by many commentators, supposed to describe some buildings, not before mentioned. Chamber, in the singular, is thought to be used for chambers, or rows of chambers in three stories. These seem to have been situated in the inner court, (13, 14;) perhaps just before the separate place, at the entrance from the north. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. Perhaps this means, that the north door was a hundred cubits from the entrance into the court; and the door, or gateway, or portico, was fifty cubits in length. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. 'One side of these buildings looked upon the 'void space about the temple, (xli. 10;) and the other 'toward the pavement belonging to the outward court.' (xl. 17.) (Lowth.) There are difficulties in these delineations, which none seem hitherto to have cleared up. A reverence is due to the word of God; some instructive meaning is doubtless conveyed, which will one day be manifested: in the mean while, I would give any hints or conjectures that I can. I am, however, far from confident, that I have, in several particulars, shown the real meaning of the vision. But a hint or a conjecture, may give some other person a clue, which may help to lead him through these intricacies.

V. 4. There seems to have been two rows of these chambers, and a walk between of ten cubits width; with an entrance into it from the chambers, of one cubit in width.

7 And the wall that was without over against the chambers, toward the outer court on the forepart of the chambers, the length thereof was fifty cubits.

8 For the length of the chambers that were in the outer court was fifty cubits: and, lo, before the temple were an hundred cubits.

9 And * from under these chambers was † the entry on the east side, ‡ as one goeth into them from the outer court.

10 The chambers were in the thickness of the wall of the court toward the east, [i] over against the separate place, and over against the building.

11 And [k] the way before them was like the appearance of the chambers which were toward the north, as long as they, and as broad as they: and all their goings out were both according to their fashions, and according to their doors.

12 And according to the doors of the chambers that were toward the south, [l] was a door in the head of the way, even the way directly before the wall toward the east, as one entereth into them.

13 Then said he unto me, The north chambers and the south chambers which are before the separate place, [m] they be holy chambers, where the priests that [n] approach unto the LORD shall eat the most holy things: there shall they lay [o] the most holy things, and the meat-offering, and the sin-offering, and the trespass-offering; for the place is holy.

14 When the priests enter therein, then shall [p] they not go out of the holy place into the outer court, but there they shall lay their garments wherein they minister; for they are holy; [q] and shall put on other garments, and shall approach to those things which are for the people.

15 ¶ Now when he had made an end of [r] measuring the inner house, he brought me forth toward [s] the gate whose prospect is toward the east, and measured it round about.

16 He measured the east ◊ side with [t] the measuring reed, five hundred reeds, with the measuring reed round about.

17 He measured the north side five hundred reeds, with the measuring reed round about.

18 He measured the south side five hundred reeds, with the measuring reed.

19 He turned about to the west side, and measured five hundred reeds, with the measuring reed.

20 He measured it by the four sides: [u] it had a wall round about, [x] five hundred reeds long, and five hundred broad, to make [y] a separation between the sanctuary and the profane place.

(Lowth.) These were not supported by pillars, built on the outside of the walls, as was the case in some other balconies or galleries; but merely by the wall itself: and therefore of course the chambers grew narrower in the second story than in the first, and in the third than in the second. It does not, however, appear, how the second story was supported, as the wall of the first story was made the basis of the balcony above it; and the wall of the second the basis of the third story. Perhaps some arch was formed for this purpose; and a slight one would suffice, as the weight to be supported towards the top of the building would be comparatively small.

stated to be built on a square at least of very near an English mile on each side, or four miles in circuit. This is far greater than either Solomon's temple, or that after the captivity ever was: or indeed than the mountain of the temple was capable of containing, according to the description of the Jewish writers. This shows that the vision cannot be explained of any temple that hath hitherto been built, nor indeed of any literal temple; but figuratively and mystically. Some learned men indeed, on the authority of the Septuagint, would substitute cubits for reeds in all these verses: but the word cubits does not once occur; whereas the word reeds is repeated four times. It is evident, that the Greek translators had Solomon's temple in view, and changed reeds for cubits, in order to adjust the dimensions of this temple to those of Solomon's: and that later writers have proposed the alteration in the text for the same reason. But, if men allow themselves to substitute one word for another, in the sacred text, because the alteration would render that consistent with their systems, which otherwise would be incompatible with them, there is no knowing to what lengths they may proceed. Surely it is better to acknowledge our ignorance, on such abstruse subjects, than to support a favourite scheme of interpretation by giving countenance to so dangerous a measure!

The Sanctuary. 'The whole compass of ground, which 'was within the precincts of the temple, elsewhere called 'the holy mountain.' 'In comparison of which, the 'holy city itself was esteemed but as profane ground.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The public worship of God in his courts, the secret devotion of the closet, and the social intercourse of Christians, should all be attended to in their places; in order to produce a conversation becoming the Gospel of Christ.—When true religion shall diffuse its benign influence through the nations, and the churches of the saints shall be exceedingly multiplied, we may expect greater unity in judgment, worship, and practice, than there is in the present low and divided state of vital godliness. Whilst as spiritual priests we approach to the Lord, through our glorified High Priest, feed on the sacrifice that he hath offered, and appear before God clothed in his robe of spotless righteousness, we should be careful to exemplify the tendency of our principles in the holiness of our lives. We should in every thing support the distinction between sacred and profane: the minister must not leave the sanctuary to pollute himself by sin, to involve himself in secular concerns, or to renounce his ministry. The man that hath put his hand to the plough, and looketh back, is not fit for the kingdom of God: true believers continue to the end in the ways and service of the Lord; this is their privilege, their desire, and their practice. Sacred things must not be made subservient to secular interests; but these must be subordinated to the concerns of religion, and kept distinct from, or rendered subservient to, them. However the privileges and liberty of believers may be enlarged, or the boundaries of the church extended, a separation still subsists betwixt the righteous and the wicked, which will be manifested, and made final and eternal, in the approaching day of righteous retribution.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLIII. V. 2—5. (Marg. Ref.) 'The 'word, Behold, is an expression of joy and admiration: 'as if the prophet had said, Behold a wonderful and 'joyful sight! The glory of the God of Israel, which 'had so long departed from this place, is now returned to 'it, and the same way by which it departed.' (Lowth.) —It is not recorded, that the Glory of God visibly took possession of the second temple; as it had done of the tabernacle, and afterwards of Solomon's temple, when consecrated. It therefore seems necessary to look beyond the return of the Jews from Babylon, and the rebuilding of the temple, for the fulfilment of these predictions. Indeed the personal presence of Immanuel, at the second temple, rendered it more glorious than that built by Solomon; (Hag. ii. 9;) yet this part of the vision rather relates to the times, which are supposed to be predicted in the whole of this description; namely, those that shall succeed the conversion of the Jews, and their restoration to their own land. The prophet saw the glory of the God of Israel coming "from the east." Christ is "the Sun of right-"eousness;" and as the sun ariseth in the east; so did he arise in the eastern regions, and thence his light hath been communicated to the western world. It is not intimated, that a dark cloud attended this visible glory, as under former dispensations: for the full light of the Gospel dispels the darkness which before rested on heavenly things. It was however attended by a voice like the noise of many waters: which may denote the efficacy of the Gospel in alarming and converting sinners, or the terrible denunciations of the Lord's vengeance on all opposers of his people, whom he will overwhelm as by the roaring and vehemence of some great inundation. "The earth also shined with "his glory:" for the light of the divine truth, displaying the glory of God in Jesus Christ, shall illuminate all the nations when those times shall arrive. The glory of God, which the prophet saw, resembled that which had before appeared to him: (Notes, i. iii. x. xi.) He then foretold the destruction of Jerusalem with such exactness, that it might be said he came to destroy it: but now he predicted the Lord's return to the city, and its prosperity; and he had a renewal of the same vision, which caused him to prostrate himself in humble adoration of the divine majesty. Thus the glory of God filled the temple: and the divine Spirit brought the prophet into the inner court to witness that transaction.

V. 6. While the prophet was adoring the manifested glory of God, he was addressed by a voice out of the temple, and charged with the subsequent message. It is observed that the man who had been his instructor stood by him. If this was the Messiah, as many think, then the prophet had a vision of the three persons in the sacred Trinity manifesting in different ways their presence with him. (Notes, Matt. iii. 16, 17. xvii. 1—8.)

V. 7—9. JEHOVAH had dwelt between the cherubim, above the mercy seat and the ark of the covenant; so that in this respect he had a throne and a footstool at his temple: but the people and their kings had defiled his sanctuary and his holy name by their idolatries. "The "carcasses of their kings," may signify, either the idols worshipped by the kings of Judah, which were as lifeless and as loathsome before God as putrid carcasses; or the dead bodies of the children whom they sacrificed to their abominable idols, upon high places erected within sight of the temple. But, indeed, they had brought their images even into the sanctuary itself: so that the thresholds and pillars of the places erected for idolatry stood close by, or over against, the threshold, pillars, and posts of the temple: and there was but a wall between the glorious God and these his contemptible and detestable rivals! Thus they provoked him, so that he consumed them in his anger. But the Lord here engaged, that this shall no more be the case: the house of Israel shall no more defile his sanctuary and his holy name, as they had done: "Now shall they," says he, "put away their whoredom and the carcasses of "their kings far from me, and I will dwell in the midst "of them for ever." This is the literal translation of the ninth verse. It is evidently a prediction, or a promise, and not an exhortation. And thus it exactly accords with the prophecies in many of the chapters preceding this vision. (Marg. Ref.) After the return of the Jews from Babylon, they relapsed no more into gross idolatry: but they soon were led to prefer their own traditions and superstitions to the commandments of God; and they rejected Christ, to cleave to their own pharisaical righteousness. Thus "they set their thresholds by God's threshold." The same hath been more or less done by every society of Christians and their rulers: but the Lord will shortly purify his whole church from all abuses, idolatries, superstitions, false doctrines, and human inventions: and when this is done, he will come gloriously to dwell in his Church for ever; on earth to the end of the world, in heaven to all eternity.

V. 10, 11. "Show the house of Israel, &c. and "they shall be ashamed," &c. The Jews must be shown the measure and pattern of the house, in order to render them ashamed of their idolatries and iniquities; and when this had produced its effect, they would be more fully informed concerning all the regulations and laws of it, which would be written before them, that they might do them. This would tend to remind them of what God had done for them in times past, and to show them what he had reserved for them in future: and on both accounts to make them ashamed of their rebellions: it would also serve to expose their sins, and to direct their reformation. This may also refer to the times, when the whole church shall be reformed according to the standard of scripture: when all Christians shall discern by that light their deviations from the truth of God, in doctrine, discipline, worship, and practice, and, repenting of them, attempt to rectify them. 'We may probably suppose, that the model of 'God's temple, here set forth, is but a pattern of hea-'venly things, as Moses' was, (Ex. xxv. 40;) and a 'type of that pure church, "built upon the foundation of "the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ being the chief "Corner-stone," 'which we may hope God will, in due 'time, every where restore. And in the mean time it is 'the duty of all good Christians, according to their ability, 'to inform themselves and others, what is the pattern, 'form, and fashion of this true church,—in order to re-'form all those deviations which have been made from it.' (Lowth.)

V. 12. This is the law, or rule, concerning the house; that the whole area above described, (xlii. 16—20,) should be most holy, and no part of it used for common purposes.

V. 13—17. The bottom of the altar, which lay on the ground, seems to have extended a full cubit beyond the rest of it; and a border of a span breadth was placed around it, as some think, to keep the blood of the sacrifices from running upon the pavement, and to confine it to the channel by which it was carried off. This was the higher place, or ground, compared with the rest of the court, being raised one cubit above it. From this bottom to the lower settle was two cubits. The settles seem to have been ledges of a cubit in breadth, on each side of the altar, on which the priests might walk to perform what was needful to be done. From the lower settle to the higher was four cubits. The lower settle, or in-benching, is called the lesser, and the higher, the greater: yet it does not appear, that the higher was broader than the lower, and the extent of it must have been less: but it would be most conspicuous on account of its height, and so more noticed. Above this upper settle the altar was raised four cubits, and on the corners four horns were fixed. The upper part of the altar was twelve cubits square; but the lower settle, measuring at the outside, was fourteen; for the two settles deducted two cubits on each side from the dimensions at the bottom. God commanded in the law, that the priests should not ascend by stairs, or steps, to the altar: and the original here only means ascents, probably by a sloping gradual rising. 'This ascent is directed to 'be placed at the east side of the altar, that they who 'went up should look toward the west and upon the 'temple; and should turn their backs to the rising sun, 'in opposition to the rites of those idolaters who wor-'shipped the rising sun. Dr. Lightfoot remarks, out of 'the Jewish writers, that within two cubits of the top, 'or place where the hearth was, there was another nar-'rowing of a cubit in breadth, where the priests stood to 'officiate. The altar is mentioned under different names: 'Harel is the mountain of God, as some Rabbins think, 'in opposition to the idolatrous altars built upon high 'places: Ariel is the lion of God, because it devoured 'and consumed the sacrifices.' (Lowth.) Perhaps the hearth is particularly meant. The description of this altar materially differs from the account given of that which was made when Solomon built the temple. That was indeed nearly the same height as this, but it was twenty cubits square; and nothing is said about any settles or in-benchings; but the reader is led to suppose that it was as wide at the top as at the bottom: and the altar erected after the captivity was set upon his bases, probably on the very foundation of the altar made by Solomon, and of the same dimensions. These considerations confirm the supposition, that the state of the church, or of Israel, when converted to Christ and restored to their own land, is predicted, under emblems taken from the ceremonies of the Mosaical dispensation. But, perhaps, the precise meaning of each particular will not be understood, till explained by the fulfilment.

V. 18—27. These rules for the dedication of the altar, and consecration of the priests, in some things agreed with, in others differed from, those prescribed by Moses. But the instruction seems to be the same as hath been deduced from those types and shadows of the ceremonial law, in the books of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers: and the same evangelical truths are here prophetically proposed, as were there exhibited in the way of positive injunction. It is remarkable that the prophet is addressed as if he were personally to superintend the service in the same manner that Moses did, when the tabernacle was set up, and when Aaron and his sons were consecrated. Yet he was not employed at the consecration of the altar or temple, after the captivity: but probably was dead before that time.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—12.

All external institutions of religion derive their excellency and efficacy from the presence and manifested glory of God in them: and as this glory is displayed by Christ our Sun of righteousness, we sinners may behold it with comfort. His voice indeed is very terrible to his enemies, and at first excites great commotion and consternation in the hearts of his chosen people: but when they are taught by the Holy Spirit, they experience its power accompanied with peace and comfort to their souls. Every display of the divine glory should inspire our hearts with reverential awe; and the condescension and multiplied visits of our gracious God, should never cause us to forget our own unworthiness and vileness. He may for a time hide his face from his Church or any of his servants, to rebuke their sins and to humble them for their good: but in due time he will return: and as his glory irradiates the soul of him that beholds it, so it will ere long illuminate the whole earth.—It is of the infinite mercy of our God, that he reigns upon "the throne of grace" over his redeemed people, and makes his Church the place of the soles of his feet. But if we would have the assurance and comfort of this his condescending love, we must seek his sanctifying grace; that we may no more defile his holy name, or our souls that are his temple, by our sins; or his Church by immoralities, impieties, or superstitions. For by thus setting up their thresholds and posts in opposition to the Lord's, even kings have often substituted a carcass of worthless, if not idolatrous, observances, in the place of vital and evengelical godliness. And for these things, God hath abhorred the services of his professed people, and consumed them in his anger, from age to age. As every particular will be regulated and reformed in that happy period which approaches, according to the sacred scriptures: so we should now put away whatever hath displeased God in the conduct of his people in other ages, that we may personally anticipate those times, and do what we can towards preparing for them. The goodness of God towards us should lead us to repentance; and the discovery of the rule and pattern for our conduct will show us the necessity of it, and direct us in it; "for by the law is the knowledge "of sin." But when Christ crucified, and "the things "that are freely given us of God" through him, are shown to the soul by the Holy Spirit, they peculiarly fill us with shame for all our iniquities. This penitent frame of mind prepares us for fuller discoveries of the mysteries of redeeming love, and for a more distinct understanding of all the ordinances and commandments of God. The whole of the scriptures are written, and should be opened and applied, that men may perceive their sins and repent of them, and their duties and do them: that all, which belongs to the Church of God, may be most holy, according to the law of the house.

V. 13—27.

We wretched sinners can no more be holy, without the sanctification of the Spirit, than we can be righteous, or have access to God, except through Christ, our Altar, Priest, and Oblation. We now need offer no more atoning sacrifices, for "by one offering he hath perfected for ever "them that are sanctified;" but the sprinkling of his blood is incessantly requisite to us, in all our approaches to God the Father. Even his royal and chosen priesthood, who minister unto him, could not be permitted to present their spiritual sacrifices, were they not cleansed from guilt through his precious blood: all their powers and faculties and senses need the same cleansing, before they can serve God acceptably in body and soul: their best services contract so much pollution from remaining sinfulness, that they can only be accepted, as sprinkled with that blood which cleanseth from all sin. But when they come in the appointed way to the mercy-seat, their Advocate pleads for them within the sanctuary above, and his blood is the propitiation for their sins: they themselves become living sacrifices, holy and acceptable to God through him; and being daily washed in his blood and seasoned with the salt of his purifying grace, they "glorify him in body and "spirit, which are his." All our approaches to God should be with recollection and deliberation: our hearts should be previously prepared for attending on solemn ordinances, especially for devoting ourselves to the Lord at his table: ministers should seriously prepare for entering upon, and continually executing, their important work: and we should all daily be preparing to meet our God in death and judgment; that we may then find his gracious acceptance, and render him our eternal Hallelujahs.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLIV. V. 1—3. He brought me to the 'gate of the outer sanctuary, which looked eastward; and 'that gate which I had seen formerly open, (as that by 'which the glory of God visibly entered into the temple,) 'was now shut. Then said the Lord unto me, this gate 'shall continue shut, and no ordinary person shall ever 'enter by it; because the Lord God of Israel hath honoured 'and hallowed it, by entering in thereby.' (Bp. Hall.) Some suppose, that by the prince the high priest is meant; and others the civil governor, as Zerubbabel, or Nehemiah. But as no such rules were laid down in the Mosaic law, or precribed concerning Solomon's temple: so there appear no traces of their having been observed under the second temple. The Prince, in many of the preceding prophecies, evidently means Christ, (Marg. Ref.:) And whatever be prophetically intended, the injunction may remind us, that none can enter heaven, the true sanctuary, as Christ did; namely, by virtue of his own excellency, and his personal holiness, righteousness, and strength. He who is the Brightness of JEHOVAH's glory entered this way: but it is now shut to the whole human race; and we all must enter as sinners, by faith in his blood, and by the communication of his grace. The prince, having entered by the portico of this gate, would there sit to eat bread before the Lord: and then return to his palace by the same way, (xlvi. 8, 9.) this may signify the Saviour's meeting his people, and communing with them in his ordinances, and especially at his table; and coming to them and returning to his heavenly palace, so to speak, by a way of his own; as the kings of the house of David did from their palace to the temple and back again. (Marg. Ref.) JEHOVAH, by an audible voice out of the sanctuary, is represented as thus speaking to the prophet.

V. 4. 'The east-gate being shut, there was no door 'into the house on the north side; but I could see the 'brightness of the divine glory shining through the win-'dows.' (Lowth.)

7 In that [o] ye have brought into my sanctuary * strangers [p] uncircumcised in heart, and uncircumcised in flesh, to be in my sanctuary, to pollute it, even my house, [q] when ye offer my bread, [r] the fat and the blood, and they have [s] broken my covenant, because of all your abominations.

8 And [t] ye have not kept the charge of mine holy things: but ye have set keepers of my † charge in my sanctuary for yourselves.

9 Thus saith the Lord GOD, [u] No stranger, uncircumcised in heart, nor uncircumcised in flesh, shall enter into my sanctuary, of any stranger that is among the children of Israel

10 And [x] the Levites that are gone away far from me, when Israel went astray, which went astray away from me after their idols; they shall even [y] bear their iniquity.

11 Yet they shall be ministers in my sanctuary, [z] having charge of the gates of the house, and ministering to the house: they [a] shall slay the burnt-offering and the sacrifice for the people, [b] and they shall stand before them to minister unto them.

12 Because [c] they ministered unto them before their idols, and ‡ caused the house of Israel to fall into iniquity; [d] therefore have I lifted up mine hand against them, saith the Lord GOD, [e] and they shall bear their iniquity.

13 And [f] they shall not come near unto me, to do the office of a priest unto me, nor to come near to any of my holy things, in the most holy place: but they shall [g] bear their shame, and their abominations which they have committed.

14 But I will make them [h] keepers of the charge of the house for all the service thereof, and for all that shall be done therein.

15 But the priests the Levites, [i] the sons of Zadok, that kept the charge of my sanctuary, when the children of Israel went astray from me, they shall come near to me to minister unto me, and [k] they shall stand before me to offer unto me [l] the fat and the blood, saith the Lord GOD:

16 They shall enter into my sanctuary,

V. 6 (Marg. Ref.) When the prophet had well compared the conduct of his people with the laws of the house, it would be evident to him that they had been guilty of many abominations; and he was ordered to call them to repentance and reformation, as they had already become exceedingly guilty.

V. 7—9. 'Setting up idols within the precincts of 'the house, and appointing idolatrous priests to officiate 'there.' 'Or they suffered the heathen to offer at God's 'altar expressly against the law.' (Lowth.) The last mentioned profanation is not recorded in any instance.—The introduction of uncircumcised persons to eat of the peace-offerings and oblations, would have been a gross violation of the Mosaic law. But the uncircumcised in heart, as well as in flesh, are mentioned; yet there was no law to exclude unregenerate persons, who were circumcised and ritually clean, from the ordinances of the temple: so that this must denote a different constitution. And it seems to refer to the prostitution of the Christian sacraments, by admitting ungodly persons, who come from secular motives, to partake of them; and to the admission of such persons into the ministry, as seek nothing but the emolument; which things are the scandal, and threaten the ruin, of the protestant churches, as well as others. Thus God's covenant is broken, and its seals and the most sacred institutions of Christianity are prostituted, secularized, and abused; the most holy things are neglected, and keepers are placed over the charge of God in the sanctuary, to please the humours, to flatter the pride, or to subserve the lusts of men. All these abuses will be terminated, when this prophecy shall be fulfilled.

V. 10—14. Even those Levites, who were also priests as descended from Aaron, had often led the Jews into idolatry, by their example and influence; and yet in general they had been permitted to perform the most honourable parts of their sacred function: but, in the times predicted, such persons would deservedly be disgraced, and punished by degradation to the meaner and more laborious services; such as the work of porters, or slaying the sacrifices.—Few, if any, of those who before the captivity had been criminal in this respect, witnessed the restoration of the temple-service; nor does it appear that their descendants were thus degraded, on account of the idolatry of their ancestors: and after the captivity, it is not recorded, that any of the priests were guilty of leading the people to worship idols. But a thorough reformation of the whole Church, or the prevalence of pure religion among the converted Jews, is evidently predicted, under allusion to Mosaic institutions. Thus, perhaps, those ministers who have countenanced antichristian idolatries, or who have been heretical in their doctrines, or scandalous in their lives, may be excluded from the sacred service, and otherwise punished and disgraced, when the times here predicted shall arrive: yet, being brought to repentance, they may be employed in the worship of God, and admitted to perform more ordinary services. Or, in general, effectual means will be used, to prevent the exceedingly great scandal and mischief of an unregenerate and ungodly ministry.

and they shall come near [m] to my table, to minister unto me, and they shall [n] keep my charge.

17 ¶ And it shall come to pass, that when they enter in at the gates of the inner court, [o] they shall be clothed with linen garments; and no wool shall come upon them, whilst they minister in the gates of the inner court, and within

18 They shall have linen [p] bonnets upon their heads, and shall have [q] linen breeches upon their loins: they shall not gird themselves * with any thing that causeth sweat.

19 And when they go forth into the outer court, even into the outer court to the people, [r] they shall put off their garments wherein they ministered, and lay them in the holy chambers, and they shall put on other garments; and they shall not [s] sanctify the people with their garments.

20 Neither shall they [t] shave their heads, [u] nor suffer their locks to grow long; they shall only poll their heads.

21 Neither [x] shall any priest drink wine, when they enter into the inner court.

22 Neither shall they take for their wives [y] a widow, nor her that is † put away; but they shall take maidens of the seed of the house of Israel, or a widow ‡ that had a priest before.

23 And they shall [z] teach my people the difference between the holy and profane, and cause them to discern between the unclean and the clean.

24 And [a] in controversy they shall stand in judgment; and they shall judge it according to my judgments: and they shall keep my laws and my statutes [b] in all mine assemblies; [c] and they shall hallow my sabbaths.

V. 15, 16. Zadok was made high priest by Solomon, when Abiathar was degraded for rebellion, according to the sentence denounced against the family of Eli. (Marg. Ref.) Zadok signifies righteous: and it is probable that his posterity in general supported the worship of JEHOVAH; when the other priests went astray from him; and therefore the priesthood was to be established among them; and they would be honoured by exclusively performing those services in which the priests had the nearest access to God. They typified faithful, holy, and conscientious ministers of Christ: and it is here predicted under this allusion, that such ministers shall greatly abound, and be encouraged in this happy period. It is observable, that the table in the sanctuary is mentioned rather than the altar of incense; perhaps intimating the change in the external institutions of divine worship, that would take place before the accomplishment of the prophecy. It is not easy to determine, whether any external regulations, in respect of divine ordinances, answering to these predictions, will be made among the converted Jews, when reinstated in their own land.

V. 17—20. The garments of the priests are here referred to; though with some variations. (Marg. Ref.)—The prescribed attire seems to denote, that every thing should be so devised, as to render Christians and ministers most unencumbered, and prepared for their work; and that they should avoid all appearance of evil, and whatever may prove offensive and disgustful in their deportment and ministrations. The putting off of their garments, that they might not sanctify the people with them, may refer to the superstitions in use among papists and others, which suppose some sanctifying efficacy inherent in the garments or relics of holy men. 'They shall not tie them to an 'expectation of sanctity to be derived from them.' (Bp. Hall.) All these superstitions will be at length abolished; and yet a decent distinction will be preserved between things sacred and common. (Note, xlii. 14.) The way also in which the priests were directed to wear their hair, in the medium between opposite extremes, might denote the attention that should be paid to gravity and decorum in their external appearance, as well as the simplicity and spirituality of their hearts.

Within. (17.) That is, in the temple itself.

V. 21. (Note, &c. Lev. x. 8—11.)

V. 22. According to the law, the high priest was not allowed to marry either a widow, or a divorced person: but here, all the priests are forbidden to marry any widow, except the widow of a priest. (Notes, Lev. xxi. 7. 13—15.) This regulation plainly intimates the superior sanctity of the times referred to. There is no reason, however, to induce us to a literal interpretation of this regulation, as if binding on Christian ministers, any more than for such an interpretation of the other rules of this vision: it only implies, that in the predicted period they would avoid all scandalous or suspicious connexions, and every thing that could lessen their characters amongst the people.—It is observable, that marriage is always considered as consistent with the most sacred characters, and in the most holy persons, under every dispensation of the Church, and even in its highest state of earthly purity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 23, 24. The priests and Levites under the Mosaic dispensation frequently acted as Magistrates. In allusion to which, it is perhaps here intimated, that controversies will, in the times predicted, be generally decided by arbitration; by reference to ministers and according to the law of God; and not by litigations before human tribunals, according to the laws of man, (5.)—The particular mention of hallowing the sabbath, in this emblematical prophecy of a future prosperous state of religion, implies the importance, as well as the perpetual obligation, of that sacred institution: when true piety most prevails, it will be most honoured by ministers and people.

V. 25—27. 'Whosoever touched a dead body became 'legally unclean: this uncleanness continued seven days; '—and the priests were to reckon to him, (a priest,) seven 'days more.' (Lowth.) (Notes, Lev. xxi. 6. Num. xix. 11—22.) The superiority of Christian ministers, in the approaching happy period, over their natural affections, is here denoted, with reference to the law of Moses: they are supposed to mourn for their near relations; but they are represented as moderating their grief, and not long permitting it to interrupt them in their important work. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28—30. (Marg. Ref.) The portion both of the land and of its increase, which were presented as a holy oblation to God, were by him given to the priests for their maintenance. Thus they would have no inheritance distinct from the portion which God reserved for himself. They would be maintained, so to speak, at his table; and would forfeit their support, if his worship should be forsaken. What particular regulations, concerning the provision for ministers in the predicted times, are thus foretold, the event must determine: certainly important alterations are needful in that respect.

V. 31. This was forbidden to all Israelites by the law; here only to the priests: perhaps because all Christians are spiritual priests; or as intimating a repeal, or alteration, of the ancient ceremonial institutions. In general it may intimate, that they would keep at a distance from all polluting, inordinate, or inexpedient indulgence of their appetites.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

No man should presume, even in appearance, to arrogate to himself that glory which belongeth to God alone. It is also very proper that Christ our Prince should in all things have the pre-eminence: but though the way by which he hath entered into heaven is for ever shut against the whole fallen race of Adam, yet he hath opened for us "a "new and living way," by which we may find access and acceptance, through faith in his blood. He also graciously comes among his assembled people, to commune with them, before they go to be with him in heaven. Then the glory of the Lord filleth his sanctuary, and his people adore him with humble gratitude: and we should carefully meditate on these goings of our God and King, and hearken to all that he says to us, concerning the ordinances and laws of his house; and we should mark well the entrance into his courts, and all the goings out of them. Thus we shall be able to see how rebelliously even professed Christians have prostituted his sacraments and the sacred ministry, by throwing them open to strangers, enemies, and evidently unregenerate persons; to the disgrace of the Gospel, the grief of true believers, and the encouragement of wicked men. Alas! they to whom these charges have been committed, have not kept them: but have profaned them for secular interest or carnal affection; to feed hungry relatives, or to enrich or humour ungodly connexions. Or men have heaped to themselves flattering teachers after their own lusts; or they have made the seals of God's covenant the passport to preferment! These are gross violations of the covenant, and great abominations of which it should suffice all the parties concerned. They have always been the ruin of vital godliness, in proportion as they have prevailed: and, alas! they prevail almost universally. But whatever men may connive at or determine, the Lord will certainly exclude all such as are uncircumcised in heart; and though they may enter into the outward sanctuary, they shall find no admission into heaven.—Those professed ministers of religion who forsake God, and lead the people astray into idolatry, superstition, or wickedness, shall even bear their iniquity: and when they who sustain this sacred character fall into scandalous sins, they should not be hasty in returning to their public work: for even if they repent, and again serve God and enjoy communion with him, and be in some respects employed by him; yet they may not be able to recover their influence, or to be useful as before: and if they be degraded, and bear their shame, for an example to others, they should not complain, but be thankful for acceptance in the meanest place or most laborious services. But such as indeed keep the charge of the sanctuary, and closely adhere to the Lord when others go astray from him, and boldly protest against prevailing crimes, shall be peculiarly honoured of God, as instruments of glorifying him, and of doing good to his people, by their prayers, examples, and ministrations.

All who are employed in the important work of the ministry, should be of harmless and blameless conversation; sound in the faith, full of good works; of exemplary temperance, sobriety, and gravity; walking humbly before God and circumspectly in the sight of men; not arrogating honour to themselves, or leading the people into a superstitious veneration of them; yet acting honourably, and maintaining a sober peculiarity in their whole conduct. They should perform the most common actions of life, in a pious and sanctified manner; their apparel, and the whole of their style of living, should be plain, simple, frugal, and such as may manifest their indifference about worldly things: they should be careful in forming connexions, and in the choice of wives, and prudent in the management of their families; showing that they are governed by reason, conscience, and the fear of God, not by passion and humour, in all these matters. They should teach the people, both by word and example, the difference between the holy and profane, the clean and the unclean: they should study to be peace-makers, and should regulate their judgment and decisions in all cases by the commandments of God; and not according to their own humours, interests, or partialities: they should observe, and teach others to observe, the statutes of the Lord, in all the ordinances of his house and in hallowing his sabbaths: they should govern their passions and moderate their sorrows, by stricter rules than they expect others to do; not suffering their work to be interrupted, or improperly performed, whenever they can help it. They should delight in every part of their sacred services; and yet do all in a humble reliance on Christ our Sin-offering, and his precious blood and prevailing intercession: and they should be superior to all avarice and sensuality. The Lord himself is the Portion of such ministers: and they need not fear a temporal subsistence, though they have no possession in Israel. Their God will incline his servants to perform their bounden duty, by supplying their wants: and thus he will cause his blessing to rest on the houses of their benefactors, in answer to their prayers for them. So that they will not generally be obliged to involve themselves in worldly cares and employments for a maintenance: much less will they be driven to do any thing sinful or scandalous through urgent necessity: but trusting in God and doing his will, they shall be provided for as is good for them; and "having "food and raiment, they will learn to be therewith con-"tent." Lord, increase the number of such faithful and exemplary ministers; and enlarge and prosper the spiritual priesthood, all over the whole earth!

entirely differs from that which took place in the days of Joshua; and nothing at all answerable to it seems to have occurred when the Jews returned from Babylon: but whether it will be, in any measure, literally fulfilled at their future restoration to their own land; or whether it figuratively describes the regulations which shall at length take place in the affairs of the Church, needs not to be positively determined. It seems evident, that our translators did right in adding the word reeds to the numbers mentioned in this admeasurement; referring to the reed that was in the hand of Ezekiel's divine conductor, which was about four yards long: for the length and breadth of the sanctuary are stated the same as before. So that, unless the text be there totally changed, without any authority, this passage, as well as that, must be understood of reeds: and, except when the suburbs are mentioned, the word cubit does not once occur in either place. 'According to 'this measure (of cubits,) the portion here set out will 'be almost seven miles square; whereas, if we measure 'by reeds, it will arise to six times as much, and can 'only be understood in a mystical sense.' (Lowth.)—This surely is not a sufficient reason for altering the original text: for a great part of the vision, on any supposition, can only be thus interpreted. There are, however, those who make these measures immensely larger: but I neither understand their rules of computation, nor the grounds on which they proceed. It is indeed evident, that the land of Canaan could by no means admit of so large a proportion being allotted to the sanctuary, with the priests and Levites, &c: but, it is probable this was intended to intimate the immensely large extent of the Christian church above that of Israel; especially in those glorious times which are doubtless emblematically predicted. Supposing, therefore, that reeds are intended, this holy oblation would constitute a square, on the lowest computation, of above forty miles on each side. On the north end of this square, a portion of above sixteen miles in width, and above forty in length, is appointed for the priests, for their houses and possessions: but in the midst of this portion, the area of the sanctuary, about a mile square, was to be enclosed by a wall. Next to this, on the south, the other Levites were to receive their portion, of the same dimensions with that of the priests and the sanctuary. And south of this, the portion for the city was to be marked out, of the same length, but only half the width, of the portions allotted to the priests and Levites. These three portions constitute the square of twenty-five thousand reeds: and that set apart for the Prince, (the breadth of which is not mentioned,) extended in length, equal to the breadth of the before-mentioned portions; from north to south, on both the east and the west sides of the square. (Marg. Ref. Notes, xlviii.) In the predicted period, the worship and ministers of God will be liberally and conveniently provided for: the princes will be both able and willing to defray the expenses of government without oppressing their subjects; and will rule over them with equity and clemency, as the vicegerents of Christ; and the people will submit to them conscientiously, and live in peace, prosperity and godliness. These things seem to be represented in language taken from the customs of the times in which the prophet wrote. Tithes are not here mentioned.

V. 14, 15. The oblation of the sixtieth part of the wheat, barley, and oil, and one lamb out of two hundred, may be considered as the stock for the daily sacrifices, and the fund from which the ordinary expenses of the sanctuary were to be defrayed. 16 All the people of the land * shall give this oblation † for the prince in Israel.

17 And it shall be [u] the prince's part to give burnt-offerings, and meat-offerings, and drink-offerings, [x] in the feasts, and in the new-moons, and in the sabbaths, in all solemnities of the house of Israel: [y] he shall prepare the sin-offering, and the meat-offering, and the burnt-offering, and the peace-offerings, to make reconciliation for the house of Israel.

V. 17. If Christ be meant by the prince, as some think, this signifies, that he alone is the atoning sacrifice for the sins of his people: and whatever oblations they present, or whatever services they acceptably perform, must be offered in his name. The feasts here specified were typical of Christ and his salvation, and represented the sacred seasons and instituted ordinances in the Church, by which they are commemorated, and the blessings of them applied to the soul; especially the preaching of the Gospel, the Lord's day, and the Lord's supper. The difference between these regulations and the ceremonial law, may intimate a change in the external constitution of the Church.

V. 18—25. 'The words are directed to the prince,—'he was to provide the sacrifices; and the priest was to 'offer them.' (Lowth.) The marginal references show in what respect these regulations agreed with, and in what they varied from, those of the Mosaic law.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We should present to the Lord an oblation of the first and best of all our possessions, that we may honour him with our substance, and obtain his blessing on all our labours and comforts. It is the duty of Christians, according to their ability, to provide for the decent and comfortable subsistence of ministers, that they may attend to their work without distraction. But it becomes ministers to be content even with a scanty provision, and to "suffer "all things rather than hinder the Gospel of Christ." The interests of religion require that they should generally reside near their work, and as retired as may be from the vain hurry of the world: that they may give themselves to the word of God and prayer; and that every thing pertaining to them may savour of holiness and piety. Subjects also should willingly contribute what is requisite to the honourable support of their governors, and the charges of government: and princes, especially the princes of Israel, ought to imitate the equity and lenity of Christ our King: they should use their authority for the good of the people, and lay no needless or oppressive burdens on them; that they may comfortably enjoy their possessions. If any have deviated, (as, alas! too many do,) from these salutary rules; they must be warned to proceed no further, but to let the past iniquity suffice; to remove all violence and spoil, and to terminate all exactions. These are the duties of men in every age: and the happy time is coming, when all ranks in every part of the earth will attend to them. Then there will be no more fraud, oppression, misery, war, or devastation; but universal righteousness, peace, and prosperity. It is an important part of the will of God, that men should deal with exact honesty in all the transactions of life: no zeal, orthodoxy, or diligence in religion can compensate for, (though they may for a time cloak) the want of truth and justice in our moral conduct: the Lord requires a just weight, and a true balance, and exactitude in every one of our dealings. All should use their influence, and improve their talents, in promoting the cause of godliness. The sabbaths and ordinances of God and the commemoration of his benefits should be our chief delight and satisfaction: and we should aim to reduce our various duties to some regular method, that they may not interfere with each other; and to persist in it till it becomes habitual. And, though nothing we do can atone for sin, yet our zealous services testify our acceptance of the sacrifice of Christ, our Prince and High Priest, which, according to his part, he hath prepared for us, and to which we must have continual respect in all our approaches to God. For our very best duties are polluted with sin, and we pollute the ordinances in which we join, and all we are connected with, till they are cleansed in the fountain of his blood: and our errors, ignorance, and simplicity, as well as our wilful sins, need the same cleansing. But his oblation of himself once offered is of infinite sufficiency, and answers these and all other purposes of mercy to the whole multitude of believers, in every age and nation; and it would equally suffice for the whole human species, were they made willing to come to God by him, "who by one offering "hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified." As therefore Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us; let us keep the feast of faith and communion with him, not with the old leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth: let us begin our years, our months, our weeks, and days, with self-examination, repentance, faith, prayer, and devotedness to God; and spend them in the same manner. Let us live like strangers and pilgrims on earth, rejoicing in Christ, as we pass through this desert to heaven: and then we shall soon arrive in those mansions above, "where is fulness of joy, "and pleasures at God's right hand for evermore."

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVI. V. 1—3. The prophet had before observed, that "the way of the gate of the outward sanc-"tuary, which looketh toward the east,—was shut;" and had been informed, that it must not be opened, but for the prince, (Note, xliv. 1—3.) But "the gate of the "inner court" on the east is here spoken of. This was to be shut on other days, but to be opened on the sabbaths and new moons, until the evening. According to this, it seems, that none were at any time to come into the sanctuary by the east-gate of the outward court, except the prince: and that the priests and Levites must go into the inner court by the north or south gates, except on the sabbaths and new moons: when, entering the outward court by the north or south gates, perhaps they might pass into the inner court by the east-gate: or they must open it, that the prince might enter, and that the people might worship before it, with the altar and sacrifices full in view. —'The prince only shall enter by the way of that gate; 'and when he is to enter, shall stand at the post of that 'gate, until the priests have prepared his burnt-offering 'and peace-offering; and when they have made this safe 'way for him, he shall come in, having first bowed down, 'and worshipped at the threshold of the gate. Likewise 'the people shall worship at the door of this gate, but 'they shall not presume to enter by it.' (Bp. Hall.) This seems to denote the constant, reverential, and exemplary attendance of kings on the pure evangelical ordinances of religion, in the approaching flourishing days of the Church. But some interpret it of Christ's meeting his assembled people on their solemn festivals, especially on his own day, to apply to them the benefits of his atonement and prevailing mediation. The gate on the sabbaths and new moons was not to be shut till evening; which implied, that those days should be wholly employed in religious exercises: whereas on other days men might attend as they had leisure, and then return to their ordinary employments. (12.)

V. 4—7. (Marg. Ref.) 'This was a new ordinance; '—the number of the beasts, and the proportions of the 8 And when the prince shall enter, [k] he shall go in by the way of the porch of that gate, and he shall go forth by the way thereof.

9 But when the people of the land shall [l] come before the LORD in the solemn feasts, [m] he that entereth in by the way of the north-gate to worship, shall go out by the way of the south-gate; and he that entereth by the way of the south-gate, shall go forth by the way of the north-gate; he shall not return by the way of the gate whereby he came in, but shall go forth over against it.

10 And [n] the prince in the midst of them, when they go in, shall go in; and when they go forth, shall go forth.

11 And [o] in the feasts and in the solemnities, [p] the meat-offering shall be an ephah to a bullock, and an ephah to a ram, and to the lambs as he is able to give, and an hin of oil to an ephah.

12 Now when the prince shall prepare [q] a voluntary burnt-offering, or peace-offerings voluntarily unto the LORD, one shall then [r] open him the gate that looketh toward the east, and he shall prepare his burnt-offering and his peace-offerings, [s] as he did on the sabbath day: then he shall go forth; and after his going forth one shall shut the gate.

13 Thou shalt [t] daily prepare a burnt-offering unto the LORD of a lamb * of the first year without blemish: thou shalt prepare it † every morning.

14 And thou shalt prepare a meat-offering for it every morning, [u] the sixth part of an ephah, and the third part of an hin of oil, to temper with the fine flour; a meat-offering continually, by a perpetual ordinance unto the LORD.

15 Thus shall they prepare the lamb, and the meat-offering, and the oil, every morning for [x] a continual burnt-offering.

16 ¶ Thus saith the Lord GOD; [y] If the prince give a gift unto any of his sons, the inheritance thereof shall be his sons', it shall be their possession by inheritance.

17 But if he give a gift of his inheritance to one of his servants, then it shall be his [z] to the year of liberty; after it shall return to the prince: but his inheritance shall be his sons' for them.

18 Moreover [a] the prince shall not take of the people's inheritance by oppression, to [b] thrust them out of their possession; but he shall give his sons [c] inheritance out of his own possession: that [d] my people be not scattered every man from his possession.

'meat and drink-offerings, are different from those pre-'scribed by the law.' (Lowth.)

Able, &c. "According to the gift of his hand;" that is, what he shall think sufficient.

V. 8, 9. None but the prince could enter the sanctuary from the east, and there was no entrance from the west; so that all the people must enter from the north, or from the south. But they who entered from the north were to go out by the south; and they that entered by the south, to go out by the north. This may signify, that every thing should be regulated, in respect of divine worship, in that way, which may most effectually prevent disorder and interruption: but is generally supposed to intimate that men should go forward, and make progress in religion, and go through with it; and not be superficial, hypocritical, or apostate. 'There being no thoroughfare 'out of the temple westward, if the people had entered 'by the east-gate, they must have returned back the same 'way they came in; which would have been turning their 'back upon God and his residence.' (Lowth.) But as the prince was to return by the east-gate, this reason is scarcely conclusive.

V. 10. Though the prince was to enter and return by a way of his own; yet he might enter the sanctuary at the same time, and continue as long there as the people; and thus testify his fellowship with them in the worship of God.

V. 12. 'When the service is performed, he shall go 'back the same way (8); and the porter shall shut the 'gate after him; because it may not stand open on ordi-'nary days.' (Lowth.)

V. 13—15. (Marg. Ref.) It is observable, that nothing is here said about the evening-sacrifice; or the additional lamb, morning and evening on the sabbath-days. Many suppose the evening-sacrifice to be included: but as the morning is repeated in a remarkable manner, and the evening is not once mentioned, it seems rather to be an intimation of that change in the externals of religion, which the coming of Christ would introduce.

V. 16—18. This may signify that princes in those days would not waste their revenues, in enriching favourites and dependents: the prince might settle a perpetual inheritance on his son; but the grant made to any servant would expire at the year of jubilee. Some think that this signifies, that Christ our Prince gives his children, or true believers, their inheritance unalienably: but they whom he only endues with gifts and talents, and employs in some part of his service, whilst they remain unregenerate, will be deprived of all, when true Christians receive the full possession of their inheritance. And in this case, the eighteenth verse may be considered as descriptive of the character and government of our Prince of Peace. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19—24. 'The flesh of the sacrifices, which were 'to be eaten, was to be boiled, except the flesh of the 'passover. There was a place in the inner court for boil-'ing the trespass and sin-offerings, (19, 20;) and boiling 'places,—for the peace-offerings, which perhaps were 'dressed by the Levites; whereas the former were boiled 'by the priests in the court belonging to them.'—'The 'Hebrew word Keturoh, translated joined, is rendered in 'the margin, made with chimneys, which well agrees with 'the description.' (Lowth.) 'About the walls of these 'little courts, which were as kitchens, were little cham-'bers for the cooks.' The most holy things, of which none but the priests might eat, were to be prepared in the inner court: the peace-offerings, of which the people partook, were to be boiled in these little courts, at the corners of the outward court. The direction, "not to bear the "most holy things out into the outer court, to sanctify "the people," may intimate, that the peculiar privileges of believers must not be granted or left open to unconverted persons; and that they should not promiscuously be admitted to partake of the Lord's supper; as this tends to induce in them an opinion, that they are holy persons, and need not conversion: and thus occasions much superstition and delusion.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

We should worship and commune with God every day, in our closets and families, and in public, as we have time and opportunity. On six days of the week, indeed, we are called to serve him in our temporal employments; and we must not neglect those duties, even for the sake of spending all our time in the more immediate worship of the Lord. But on his own day we must occupy ourselves wholly in his sacred service: and, laying aside all other employments and avocations, as much as may be; and shaking off sloth and inactivity, we must learn to delight in the succession of one religious exercise to another, as the proper business of the whole day: and it may be right occasionally to appropriate a day from the other six, to be spent in a similar manner. It behooves those in authority to use their influence and example, in promoting a general regard to the worship of God, and their wealth in preparing every thing for it; they should frequent his holy ordinances with reverence and attention, and without betraying any symptoms of weariness: for however they may be distinguished in other matters from their subjects, they are in the sight of God entirely upon a level with them; and every distinction admissible respecting his worship, between them and others, must be confined merely to external circumstances. But whether rulers will or will not join with us, in attending on the lively ordinances, in which Christ is set forth as evidently crucified among us; he, our Prince of Peace, will surely manifest his presence amidst us: and especially when we spend his holy day with his assembled saints, and feed by humble faith on that sacrifice, which he hath prepared and offered for us. In expectation and assurance of his glorious and gracious presence, we should worship with reverence in his courts; abound in spiritual sacrifices; consecrate our talents and substance to him, according to our ability; and take care that every thing be done decently and in order. We should recollect, that Press forward is the Christian's motto: we must still depart further and further from our sins, and sinful pursuits and connexions; and get further into the knowledge, practice, and experience of the Gospel; and we should dread a hypocritical profession and worship, which generally terminate in a man's returning into his old course of sin and death. The Lord hath prescribed us many duties, as of indispensable obligation: but he hath also graciously left many things to our voluntary choice; especially as to the proportion of our time or substance, to be appropriated to his immediate worship and service: that they who greatly delight in his commandments, may abound in them to his glory, the edification of their brethren, and their own benefit; without entangling their own consciences, or prescribing rules that might be inexpedient to others; or inducing them to formal services for which they have no heart, and in which God could have no pleasure. But we must never omit our daily worship, or to apply the sacrifice of the Lamb of God to our souls, for pardon, peace, and salvation.

spiritual progeny with an unalienable inheritance: nor will he let any man in any way serve him, without allotting him a suitable reward. But it will be dreadful to be put off with a revocable portion, and to be left utterly destitute, when the children shall receive their full liberty and eternal inheritance: let us then rest in nothing short of regenerating grace, and the Spirit of adoption witnessing with our spirits, that we are children and heirs of God.—If all princes had in them the mind that was in Christ, their peaceable subjects would never have cause to complain of being thrust out of, or scattered from, their possessions, in order that favourites and dependents might be enriched with the spoil. They would rather straighten themselves to relieve the people; as "knowing the grace of "Christ, who, though he were rich, yet for our sakes became "poor, that we through his poverty might be made rich." The minister of the Gospel is as truly serving Christ and the people, when in his study he is searching the scriptures, meditating and preparing for his work, as when he is publicly preaching the word to the congregation. He should endeavour to get well acquainted with his instructions, and to speak from a matured judgment, and an experienced heart. and with fervency of spirit: he should be careful, both in dispensing the word, and in administering the sacraments, to guard the people against superstition and false confidence, and from mistaking the notion or form for the power of godliness: and every thing, in his outward accommodations, and manner of life, and his method of spending his time, should be so regulated, as may best tend to make him a "workman that need not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVII. V. 1—5. This part of the vision must be understood figuratively; and this consideration is important, in forming a determination concerning the import of the whole vision. Doubtless both Solomon's temple and the second temple were well supplied with water, conveyed thither in order to wash the sacrifices, and for similar purposes; and to preserve every thing clean and wholesome: but these waters flowed originally from the temple, not as a common sewer, but as a delightful fertilizing river. The prophet had before surveyed the doors of the house; but he now first discovered a very small stream of waters, (so the word signifies,) springing forth from under the threshold of the house eastward, at his right hand, and at the south-side of the altar. These waters no doubt were an emblem of the "Gospel preached "with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven" to render it effectual; and conveying with it all spiritual blessings to the souls of believers, and to the nations of the earth.—'The gradual rise of the waters, denotes the large effu-'sion of the Spirit, which was very remarkable at the 'first publication of the Gospel, and in its wonderful 'increase from small beginnings; and will be so again, 'when God shall "pour out the Spirit of grace" 'upon 'the Jews, in order to their conversion. The supplies of 'grace are often represented, in the holy writers, under 'the metaphor of a river, and streams watering the dry 'and thirsty earth, both cleaning and making fruitful the 'ground where they pass. The metaphor is probably 'taken from the river that watered paradise.' (Lowth.). When the prophet had been shown the source of these waters, he was led by his conductor to observe their progress and increase: and as the east gate was shut, he was brought out from the temple northward. When his conductor, with the line in his hand, had measured the length of the thousand cubits from the source, he led the prophet across the waters, which only reached to his ankles; but continuing to try their depth every thousand cubits, he found them grow still deeper every time, till they could no longer be forded, but were become a river impassable

6 And he said unto me, Son of man, [h] hast thou seen this? Then he brought me, and caused me to return to the brink of the river.

7 Now when I had returned, behold, at the * bank of the river were very [i] many trees on the one side, and on the other.

8 Then said he unto me, These waters issue out toward the east country, [k] and go down into the † desert, and go into the sea: which being brought forth into the sea, [l] the waters shall be healed.

9 And it shall come to pass that every thing that liveth, which moveth, whithersoever the ‡ rivers shall come, [m] shall live: and there shall be [n] a very great multitude of fish, because these waters shall come thither: for they shall be healed; and every thing shall live whither the river cometh.

10 And it shall come to pass, that the [o] fishers shall stand upon it from [p] En-gedi even unto En-eglaim; they shall be a place to spread forth nets; their fish shall be according to their kinds, as the fish of [q] the great sea, exceeding many.

11 But the miry places thereof, and the marshes thereof ‖ shall not be healed; they shall be [r] given to salt.

12 And [s] by the river upon the bank thereof, on this side and on that side, shall ‖ grow all trees for meat, [t] whose leaf shall not fade, neither shall the fruit thereof be consumed: it shall bring forth * new fruit according to his months, because their waters they issued out of the sanctuary: and the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof † for medicine.

except by swimming. This was an emblem of the progress of Christianity, from small beginnings to a vast increase; and the latter part of the representation may relate to the times when the Gospel shall fill the earth, and produce the most extensive and important good effects on the state of mankind in every nation. Thus the river signifies the same as the "stone, cut out without hands, and "becoming a great mountain and filling the whole earth;" and the grain of mustard-seed becoming a large plant, like a tree in which the fowls of the air make their nests. (Marg. Ref.) The passage may also be accommodated to the progressive growth in knowledge and holiness of true Christians: and it is often applied to the holy Scriptures, in which are some things plain to the meanest capacity, and others incomprehensible to the most exalted created understanding; and only to be apprehended by faith, as a river that cannot be forded.

V. 7. Trees, &c. (Note, 12.)

V. 8—10. These waters ran eastward into the desert, and then into the sea; which is supposed to mean the dead sea, or the lake of Sodom, that lay east of Jerusalem. In this sea it is said no living creature is found; at least it is probable, that it does not abound with fish, as other seas do. But the prophet was informed by his conductor, that when the waters from the sanctuary should enter the sea, its waters also would become wholesome and fit for the production and habitation of fishes; and whithersoever they flowed they would communicate life abundantly: so that fishers would spread their nets from one side of this lake of Sodom to another, (for En-gedi lay on one side, and En-eglaim on the other, of the lake,) and take exceedingly great quantities of all those kinds of fish which they had been used to catch in the Mediterranean sea. This represented the efficacy of the Gospel, when attended by a divine influence, to communicate spiritual life to the most atrocious sinners, like those of Sodom; to render the Gentile nations productive of numerous converts; checking the progress of iniquity, undermining the foundations of idolatry, reforming cities and countries, and bringing men to know, worship, and serve the one living and true God, where his name had not before been known. So that the ministers of Christ would meet with abundant encouragement to labour, and to preach the Gospel, where before none ever thought of being so employed: till at length the most hopeless and benighted nations would be abundantly filled with the light and holiness of true religion.

V. 11. There would however still remain some marshes, creeks, or swamps, into which these healing waters could not find an entrance; and these must be left incurably sterile and worthless. This represents the case of those who reject or abuse the Gospel; or those countries which exclude it from among them. In short, it is the only healing medicine for the distempers of our fallen race; and they will be given up as reprobate to final ruin who are not healed by it.

V. 12. (Note, Rev. xxii. 2.) St. John hath almost transcribed this part of the vision, and applied it to the salvation of Christ, as perfected in the felicity of heaven. In his vision, the trees on each side of the river of the water of Life, seem to signify the several parts of the mediatorial work of Christ, and the sufficiency of his salvation to supply all the various wants of believers, and to complete their uninterrupted felicity. But many expositors interpret this verse of believers, who are "trees of "righteousness" planted on the banks of this river in great abundance. Yet the plenteous provisions of the Gospel, the precious promises of the sacred word, and the privileges of believers, as communicated to their souls by the quickening Spirit, may be aptly thus represented. These abound on each side of the river, wherever the Gospel is successfully preached: they afford nourishment and delight to the souls of men; they never fade or wither; they are various, according to the variety of circumstances and occasions, in the Christian's experience; as if a tree should yield a succession of different kinds of fruit, through the months of the year: and even the leaves serve as medi-

20 The west side also shall be the great sea from the border, till a man come over against Hamath. This is the west side.

21 So shall ye divide this land unto you, according to the tribes of Israel.

22 And it shall come to pass, that k ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, l and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you; and they shall be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel: m they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel.

cines to their souls; the warnings and reproofs of the word, and the salutary corrections of their Father's rod, though generally less valued, and always less pleasant than divine consolations, yet tend to cure the maladies of their souls, and to restore them to holiness and happiness. —If believers are intended by these trees, the emblem shows that they are rendered flourishing and fruitful by the word and Spirit of God; that they become exceedingly useful; that they persevere in their fuitfulness and usefulness through the various changes of life; that they exercise various Christian graces in succession; and that their profession, doctrine, example, conversation, and endeavours, powerfully tend to instruct, reform, and benefit mankind.

V. 13—23. The prophet here again returns to the division of the land, the account of which had been interrupted by intervening discoveries; (xlv. 1—8.) As no such division of Canaan took place after the captivity, this must be understood of future events. Several names are here added, or changed for others: yet the boundaries of the land are nearly the same as were marked out by Moses; except, that it does not appear whether any part, or what part, of the country, east of Jordan, is included within the eastern boundary. (Marg. Ref.) The ten tribes, as well as Judah and Benjamin, were to be admitted to a full share in the inheritance; and this seems to imply, that the future restoration of Israel to the promised land is predicted; while the circumstance of the strangers that sojourned in the land, being admitted to a share in the inheritance, as if native Israelites, plainly intimates the calling of the Gentiles into the church, and their joint inheritance with the Jews in the privileges of the Gospel and in the heavenly felicity.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The more carefully we examine the things of God and religion, the more interesting will be our discoveries concerning them. All our invaluable privileges and advantages are conveyed to us through the Gospel; they flow from Christ, our Temple, Altar, and door of access to the Father; they all spring from the everlasting love and mercy of our God, through his atoning sacrifice, and by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit. No obstructions of men or fallen angels can interrupt the communication of spiritual blessings from the fulness of Christ to the souls of his beloved people: and the course of the greatest rivers might far more easily be stopped, than the progress of his Gospel. It hath hitherto continued gradually to diffuse its influence; and it will still run wider and deeper in its energy and effects, till it shall fill, heal, and fructify the whole earth. We may rejoice in the assured hope of this happy event: and in the mean time we may be satisfied, that the water, which Christ gives his praying people, shall be in them "a well of water springing up into everlasting life." Whilst we wait for the completion of our felicity, and are conflicting with various trials and temptations; let us attend to the sacred Scriptures, beginning with the most obvious and practical truths, and proceeding gradually to those that are most difficult; remembering that many things will be found incomprehensible to us, which we must apprehend by faith and humbly adore, but not pretend to fathom, or to judge of by our limited powers or our proud reasonings. But we should chiefly mark the blessed effects which the word and Spirit of God are every where represented as producing on the souls of men; that we may inquire whether they have wrought such a change in our judgments, dispositions, and affections? Into whatever place or heart of man these healing waters flow, they communicate divine life and holiness; they counteract the various evil propensities of our fallen nature, and teach men to "deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live "soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world." So that where they abound, knowledge, purity, piety, and equity, and every thing good and useful, abound likewise. How desirable then is it to be instrumental in sending the word of God to those regions which before were given up to ignorance, impiety, and vice! And to see the preachers of the Gospel encouraged to cast their nets, and to attend to their laborious work with patient hope, and some evident success, where before sin and Satan reigned with undisturbed sway! The time is coming when they shall thus labour and prosper in those distant regions which are now enveloped in Pagan or Mahometan darkness, with as much encouragement as the apostles did at Jerusalem, when numbers were daily added to the Church of such as should be saved: and their converts shall be of the same kind as those were, "when great grace was upon them all." Yet is this blessed Gospel of salvation the savour of death to numbers in every age: and they who are not made holy by it, because they neglect, oppose, or abuse it, must die in their sins, and perish without remedy. As the Lord hath so amply provided in Christ Jesus all the rich variety of spiritual blessings, that can conduce to our comfort and holiness; and as those blessings lose no part of their beauty or excellency by the succession of ages: so Christians also should study to be useful and fruitful, the lights of the world and the healing of the people; that their whole conduct and all their endeavours may tend to render men wiser, holier, and happier, on every side of them. They should bring forth fruit suited to the seasons of adversity and prosperity, and to the various occasions and circumstances in which they are called to act: they should consider it their duty and their privilege to have their leaf unwithering and their fruit increasing, because they are watered from the sanctuary of God: and they should delight in proceeding with increasing zeal and usefulness to serve him to the end of their lives. Surely none should deem themselves branches of the living vine, who do not in some measure bring forth such fruits as he did, when he went about doing good to the souls and bodies of men! And if all that bear the name of Christians and profess the doctrine of Christ, were of this character, his religion would appear to be most excellent and beneficial in the eyes of all beholders. Such Christians need not doubt of their inheriting the good land which Canaan typified, and which the Lord hath sworn to give to the seed of Abraham: all the Gentiles who believe in Christ, and are united to him by the supply of his sanctifying Spirit, are the children of Abraham, and heirs according to promise, and will share the privileges of Israelites, without marring their inheritance: for there is room in the Church and in heaven for all who come for an interest in the blessings of that new covenant, of which Christ is the Surety and Mediator.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVIII. V. 1—7. This division of the land entirely differs from that which was made in the days of Joshua; and it is not probable that it should ever literally take place: but it seems to denote the equality of privilege which subsists amongst all the tribes of the redeemed, whatever their previous characters have been, and their intimate union and communion with each other. 'This 'division of the land among the twelve tribes may imply, 'that all true Christians shall be equally sharers in the 'privileges of the Gospel.' (Lowth.) A portion is laid out for each tribe, directly across the country from east to west. (Marg. Ref.)

10 And for them, even [m] for the priests, shall be this holy oblation; toward the north five and twenty thousand in length, and toward the west ten thousand in breadth, and toward the east ten thousand in breadth, and toward the south five and twenty thousand in length: [n] and the sanctuary of the LORD shall be in the midst thereof.

11 * It shall be for the priests that are sanctified of [o] the sons of Zadok; which have kept my † charge, which went not astray, when the children of Israel went astray, [p] as the Levites went astray.

12 And this oblation of the land that is offered, shall be unto them [q] a thing most holy, by the border of the Levites.

13 And over against the border of the priests, the Levites shall have [r] five and twenty thousand in length, and ten thousand in breadth: all the length shall be five and twenty thousand, and the breadth ten thousand.

14 And [s] they shall not sell of it, neither exchange, nor alienate the first-fruits of the land: [t] for it is holy unto the LORD.

17 And the suburbs of the city shall be toward the north two hundred and fifty, and toward the south two hundred and fifty, and toward the east two hundred and fifty, and toward the west two hundred and fifty.

18 And the residue in length over against the oblation of the holy portion shall be ten thousand eastward, and ten thousand westward: and it shall be over against the oblation of the holy portion; and the increase thereof shall be for food unto them [x] that serve the city.

19 And they that serve the city, [y] shall serve it out of all the tribes of Israel.

20 All the oblation shall be five and twenty thousand, by five and twenty thousand: ye shall offer the holy oblation [z] four-square, with the possession of the city.

21 And [a] the residue shall be for the Prince, on the one side and on the other of the holy oblation, and of the possession of the city over against the five and twenty thousand of the oblation toward the east border, [b] and westward over against the five and twenty thousand toward the west border, over against the portions for the prince: and it shall be the holy oblation; and the sanctuary of the house shall be in the midst thereof.

22 Moreover from the possession of the Levites, and from the possession of the city, being in the midst of that which is the Prince's, between the border of Judah and the border of Benjamin, shall be for the prince.

23 As for the rest of the tribes, from the east side unto the west side, [c] Benjamin shall have * a portion.

V. 35. It is most obvious to interpret these measures, of the reed which the prophet's conductor held in his hand: for what was the use of it, but to measure with? Or what measure should we compute by, but that which the Spirit of God hath pointed out to us? By this measure the city would be near forty miles in circuit, or ten miles on each side of the square; which was vastly larger than Jerusalem ever was. Doubtless the large dimensions of the city and land were intended to intimate the great increase of religion, and the propagation of the Gospel in the times predicted. The land here divided is never called Canaan, nor the city measured, Jerusalem; probably because they were merely figurative of spiritual blessings to the Church: but JEHOVAH-shammah, or, the LORD is there, is the name given to this holy city; signifying that his powerful and gracious presence with his Church is the source of all her peace, security, felicity, and holiness; and that at length these blessings will be abundantly communicated, and his presence and glory signally displayed among his people. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When true converts enter the Church by faith in Jesus Christ, all their former sins are blotted out, every stigma is removed, all distinctions are swallowed up, and the vilest of them are admitted to a full participation of all the privileges of the children of God, and made heirs according to the hope of eternal life. Yet on earth some of them must be placed more advantageously than others for their spiritual improvement; and in proportion to their degrees of grace and fruitfulness on earth, so will be their capacity for, and enjoyment of, the glory and felicity of heaven.—Our inheritance, as the spiritual priests of the living God, cannot be forfeited or exchanged: nor should we desire to change the temporal portion, which our gracious Lord hath allotted us. Especially it behooves the ministers of Christ to be contented in their places, and with such things as they have: and as they must by no means waste or alienate the revenues appropriated to the maintenance of religion; so the Lord will call those to a strict account who plunder them, or make the concerns of religion to subserve their love of filthy lucre. In the visible Church on earth, there will still be some part profane; even believers must spend part of their time in those employments which do not immediately belong to religion; and though these must be performed from pious motives and in a conscientious manner, yet they should be kept distinct from spiritual concerns. All that belong to the Israel of God should serve the common cause, in their proper places, and according to their abilities: and they who occupy themselves in so good a work, should not be left destitute of such things as are needful for them. The way of access into the Church is open on every side, that sinners may enter by faith, from all quarters of the globe, and from all the tribes of the earth: and all that belong to the true Church below, shall find at last admission into the holy city above: for all things are so regulated and established by the power, truth, and love of God, that no believer shall ever be ashamed of his confidence. Through the whole extent of the Church, even when it shall fill the earth, the Lord will vouchsafe his gracious presence and blessing. May we be found citizens of this holy city, and act consistently with that character; and have the benefit and comfort of the Lord's presence with us, in life, death, and for evermore.

BOOK OF DANIEL.

THE writer of this book was contemporary with, but probably younger than, Ezekiel; yet he began to prophesy before him, and continued in his prophetical office much longer. He was of the royal family of Judah; and having been early in life carried captive to Babylon, he soon became renowned for wisdom, and was advanced to great authority under Nebuchadnezzar: and he seems to have continued in an exalted station, and in offices of great trust and power, through the whole subsequent period of the Chaldean monarchy, and afterwards under Darius the Mede, and Cyrus the Persian: yet he was all along more eminent for wisdom and piety, than for rank and authority. Josephus, no doubt speaking the current opinion of his countrymen at that time, calls Daniel 'one of the greatest of the prophets; for he 'was wont not only to foretel future things, as other prophets also did, but he likewise determined the 'time when they should come to pass.' But since his time, 'the Jews, in order to invalidate the evidence 'that results from the prophet's writings in support of Christianity, have, on the authority of a few 'doctors, agreed to class him among the Hagiographi, which decision, however, does not, upon their own 'rules, affect his pretensions to be considered as an inspired writer.' (Gray.)—It may further be noted, that this determination, and the frivolous reasons assigned for it, are strong proofs, that this prophecy, of seventy weeks, has created them exceedingly great difficulties; because, it so fixes the time of the Messiah's coming, that unless Jesus of Nazareth be He, all expectations of his coming must be finally disappointed, if Daniel was a prophet in the highest sense of the word.—Our Lord, however, called him "Daniel the prophet," with a special recommendation of his predictions, even the most difficult of them, to the attention of his disciples. (Compare viii. 13 ix. 27. xi. 31. xii. 11. with Matt. xxiv. 15. Mark xiii. 14.) And there is such a coincidence between his prophecies and those of St. John, 'that the latter, 'in his Revelation, doth more distinctly unfold those events, which the former foretels in general terms.' (Mede)—'But in his work hath been produced such instances of his having been a prophet, as an infi-'del cannot deny, or, if he denies, cannot disprove.' (Bp. Newton.)—'The first six chapters are chiefly 'historical, though indeed the second chapter contains the prophetical interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's 'dream, concerning the kingdoms which were successively to illustrate the power of God, who removeth 'and setteth up kings as seemeth good to him.—The four historical chapters which succeed, relate the mi-'raculous deliverance of Daniel's companions from the furnace; the remarkable punishment of Nebu-'chadnezzar's arrogance, the impiety and portended fate of Belshazzar; and the divine interposition for 'the protection of Daniel in the lions' den. All these are written with a spirit and animation highly in-'teresting. We seem to be present at the scenes described; and the whole is enriched with the most 'exalted sentiments of piety, and with the finest attestations to the praise and glory of God' (Gray.) The last six chapters are entirely prophetical; and a great part of them has generally been considered as extremely obscure. 'But it is the nature of prophecies not to be thoroughly understood, till they are 'thoroughly fulfilled. Not that such prophecies are therefore like the pagan oracles, of an ambiguous, 'equivocal, and delusive nature. Obscure they may be: but there is a wide difference between obscurity 'and equivocation. The pagan oracles were purposely worded in such a manner, that if they failed in 'one sense, they might hold good in another, though directly the contrary: the Scripture prophecies have 'a determined meaning; and though sometimes they may comprehend more events than one, yet they are 'never applicable to contrary events. The pagan oracles were delivered for the immediate direction of 'those who consulted them: and therefore a mistake at first was of more fatal consequence: the Scrip-'ture prophecies were intended more for the instruction of future ages; and therefore it is sufficient if 'time shall illustrate the particulars. The pagan oracles are no sooner understood, than they are despis-'ed:—the reverse is true of the Scripture-prophecies; and the better you understand, the more you will 'admire them. The completion of the former, demonstrates their fraud and futility, the completion of 'the latter, their truth and divinity,' (Bp. Newton.)—Some parts, however, of these predictions, are so exceedingly plain, and have been so exactly and circumstantially fulfilled, that Porphyry, a bitter enemy of Christianity, took occasion from this circumstance, to maintain that they were written after the predicted events. This is the most important testimony: for it shows, that the completion of those parts which relate to historical facts, terminating in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, was absolutely undeniable: yet it is capable of clear proof, that these prophecies were extant in the Greek language many years before Antiochus was born; and in the hands of the Egyptians, who had no kindness either to the Jews or their religion.

But, in fact, the prophecies of Daniel have in all succeeding generations received as undeniable accomplishments, as those did which relate to more ancient events. They all take their beginning from about the prophet's days: they all give a concise prophetical history of the Church and of the world, nearly to the end of time: for even the prophecy of the seventy weeks, though the first coming of the Messiah is the most prominent subject; yet shows the state of the Jewish nation to this day, and intimates events which have not yet taken place. They all, either expressly or by consequence, predict four great monarchies; the fourth of which shall last "to the time of the end;" "the end of the indignation." They all foretel long continued calamities to the Jewish nation, and to the people of God: at length terminating in the restoration of Israel, and the final and universal triumph of true religion; the kingdom of Christ and of his saints, which must endure to the general resurrection. They are not insulated predictions: they all exhibit the same grand outlines of the plan of Providence, to the period of the Church's calamities, varied in such a manner, as to reflect reciprocal light on each other. And for above two thousand years, the grand outlines of history constitute the best interpreter of the grand outlines of these astonishing prophecies. These four kingdoms have succeeded each other: they have answered the description given of them with the most surprising exactness. The Messiah came at the appointed period, and was cut off; the abomination of desolation was set up in the holy place; Jerusalem was destroyed; the poor remnant of the Jews were scattered, and remain so to this day. The fourth kingdom which thus desolated them, and persecuted the infant Christian Church, after a time, appearing in another form, has exactly answered the predictions of its blasphemy, tyranny, idolatry, and long continued dominion, given in this ancient book: and nothing now remains, but the destruction of this kingdom, the conversion of the Jews, and the final triumphs of true religion, to render the whole history of all those ages a clear comment on Daniel's prophecies.—One great cause of the uncertainty, which numbers complain of, as to the real meaning of these predictions, arises from learned and ingenious men trying to accommodate the events of their own time, (important indeed to them, but small in the grand concerns of the world during revolving thousands of years;) to some detached particulars in the prophecy. But it should be remembered, that prophecy is a very small, though exact map; on which, not every county-town, or considerable place, is found, but merely those of pre-eminent consequence.—No city, so to speak, is marked in Britain but London. It should, however, be also understood, that any interpretation, which violates the geography or chronology of prophecy, must be "a pri-" vate interpretation," and not the real meaning. Only the grand outlines are marked, and those in their due order and arrangement. It is also of great importance to note, that many of the prophets, perhaps all, in some measure, agree in the grand events predicted: the coming of a Saviour, to be the Light of the world, a great High Priest and a glorious King: "His sufferings, and the glory which would follow:" the present state of the Jews, the corruption and persecutions of the Church by a powerful and blasphemous enemy, the final restoration of Israel; and the victories, triumphs, and kingdom of the Redeemer. Some give one view of these subjects, and some another: but all agree in the general outlines; all confirm each other's testimony; and in no one instance is there a discordant voice; or any thing that can be thought so, by those who diligently examine and compare the whole. This combination of testimony gives prophecy its full force; and connected with its accomplishment, amounts to a complete moral demonstration, that the Scriptures are the oracles of God.

'The prophecy is writ, part in Hebrew, part in Chaldee; for which this reason may be assigned; that 'those parts, in which the Babylonian empire was concerned, were writ in their language, viz. from ii. 4, 'to the end of the seventh chapter; a great part of which was probably entered in their public registers.' (Lowth.)

From the consideration, that this eminent and greatly beloved servant of God was, to extreme old age, and probably till his death, a minister of state in a heathen court, we may conclude with observing, that faith and piety are not confined to any place or station in life, but that the Lord can preserve his people humble and spiritual in the midst of all possible snares, and in the most entangling employments to which his providence calls them.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. (Notes, 2 Kings xxiv. 1. Ezra i. 1—4. Jer. xxv. 1.) This may be considered as the first date of the beginning of the seventy years' captivity: for it has been shown, that there were several. 'At this 'time Jehoiakim became tributary to the king of Babylon; 'and consequently the seventy years of captivity and vas-'salage began.' (Lowth.) 'He carried the sacred vessels 'to the temple of his God; not so much for the ordinary 'use of his priests, as to be laid up for monuments in the 'treasure-house that pertained to his idol; even Bel, the god 'of the Babylonians,' &c. (Bp. Hall.)

V. 3—7. It is evident, that Daniel and his companions were carried captive with Jehoiakim, though it be not here mentioned: for this was previous to the captivity of Jehoiachin. The eastern monarchs have in every age been accustomed to employ eunuchs in their palaces and about their persons: and as these frequently were advanced to the highest dignities, the original is sometimes used in general for a courtier, or officer in the palace. It is probable, however, that Daniel and his companions were eunuchs. The master of the eunuchs on this occasion, received orders from Nebuchadnezzar to select from the young men of Israel, and especially from those of royal and noble birth, such as were unblemished in their outward form, and of comely figure, who had good capacities, and had received the rudiments of a good education; and whose prudence, good sense, and learning, might render them fit to occupy some station at court. It was then, as well as at present, deemed a branch of magnificence to be served by foreigners: perhaps the king had observed several of the young Jews to be very ingenious, and of promising abilities; and he desired to avail himself of the talents both of his native subjects, and of those whom he had acquired by conquest. These young men were to be instructed in the language and learning of the Chaldeans, and in every science that could qualify them for service. Three years were allotted to finish their education: and to encourage them to be diligent and obsequious, they were to be supplied with viands and wines every day from the king's own table. This education would tend, and probably was meant, to detach them from the interests of their people and religion, and to attach them to those of their new masters. Amongst the number selected, there were four more distinguished and conscientious than the rest: their names were all compounded with the original words for God, or Lord: Daniel signifying "God my Judge;" Hananiah, the grace of the LORD, and Azariah, the LORD is a help. It is not agreed what Mishael signifies; but it is compounded with EL, the name of God. But the master of the eunuchs changed these names for others compounded with the names of the idols of Babylon; as intimating the change he expected, or desired, in their religion. The word rendered children is frequently used for young persons when come to maturity: and it is the common opinion, that Daniel was at this time twenty years of age. Indeed we must suppose, from the narrative, that both he and his companions were at least seventeen or eighteen. As these young men were of the seed-royal, it is probable that some of them were descended from Hezekiah; and thus the prophecy concerning his posterity was exactly fulfilled. (Note, 2 Kings xx. 17, 18.)

8 ¶ But Daniel [q] purposed in his heart, that he would not [r] defile himself with the portion of the king's meat, nor with the wine which he drank; therefore he requested of the prince of the eunuchs that he might not defile himself.

9 Now [s] God had brought Daniel into favour and tender love with the prince of the eunuchs.

10 And the prince of the eunuchs said unto Daniel, [t] I fear my lord the king, who hath appointed your meat and your drink: for why should he see your faces * worse liking than the children which are of your † sort? then shall ye make me endanger my head to the king.

11 Then said Daniel to ‡ Melzar, whom the prince of the eunuchs had set over Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, 12 Prove thy servants, I beseech thee, ten days: and let them give us ∮ pulse to eat, and water to drink.

13 Then let our countenances be looked upon before thee, and the countenance of the children that eat of the portion of the king's meat: and as thou seest, deal with thy servants.

14 So he consented to them in this matter, and proved them ten days.

15 And at the end of ten days [u] their countenances appeared fairer and fatter in flesh, than all the children which did eat the portion of the king's meat.

16 Thus Melzar took away the portion of their meat, and the wine that they should drink; and gave them pulse.

17 ¶ As for these four children, [x] God gave them [y] knowledge and skill in all learning and wisdom: and ‖ Daniel had [z] understanding in all visions and dreams.

18 Now at the end of the days that the king had said he should bring them in, then the prince of the eunuchs brought them in before Nebuchadnezzar.

V. 8—16. It is probable that Daniel first formed his determination, and then brought over his companions to his views and purpose. He did not consider it as unlawful to learn the sciences and language, as a preparation for future usefulness: and we may hence decidedly conclude, they were not required to study the arts of the magicians and astrologers. He resolved, however, not to defile himself with the king's meat. Many of the dishes would consist, in part at least, of those meats which were unclean according to the law; others of them would be such as had been offered to idols; and the wine, it is probable, had been presented to them, and a part from it poured out for a libation on their altars. Daniel no doubt concluded that by eating and drinking of these provisions he should have fellowship with idolaters; and be corrupted with the prevailing luxury and intemperance of the court, as well as induced to eat such meats as the law of God forbade: and that such a self-indulgent course of life was neither suited to the afflicted state of his country, nor to his own condition as a captive, or to his character as a devoted worshipper of the God of Israel. He was therefore resolved not to defile himself: yet he did not rudely refuse what was intended in kindness; but gently and modestly requested the prince, or master, of the eunuchs, to indulge him in this respect, as his conscience was concerned in it: yet it is hardly probable that he would have succeeded quietly in his purpose, had not that God whom he so conscientiously served, given him a place in the esteem and tender compassionate regard of this stranger; by means of the excellent abilities, discretion, courteousness, and amiable qualities, with which God had endued him. He was therefore disposed to gratify Daniel: but he feared lest the king, who had given orders about the diet of the young Jews, should observe any of them to look unhealthy and dejected, (as he took it for granted they would, if they lived on pulse and water:) so that comparing their countenances with those who were not so scrupulous, he should inquire into the cause of the difference; and finding that his orders had been disobeyed, should in a rage order him to be put to death. The subsequent history shows that he had some ground, in the character of the king, for these apprehensions. It seems, however, that he was willing to connive at the desired change, though he would not order it; and perhaps he hinted to Daniel, that Melzar, his deputy, could do it with less danger: at least Daniel applied to him, and besought that a trial might be made for the space of ten days: during which time he and his friends would live upon pulse, or vegetables, and water, without any kind of animal food or wine: and if on this spare diet they did not thrive as well as those who ate the king's portion, he might afterwards refuse his concurrence. This temperate diet would be in its own nature wholesome; yet it was not suited to render them fatter in flesh than the others: but doubtless Daniel's confidence was placed on the special blessing of God, to render it so nourishing, that he and his friends might no more be tempted to defile themselves. It cannot, however, be supposed, that he would in any case have consented to eat forbidden food, whatever sufferings his refusal might have exposed them to. But the Lord did not disappoint his expectation; for his looks and that of his friends fully satisfied Melzar, that he might safely leave them to their own plan; and so he took away, perhaps as a perquisite to himself, the portion that was allotted them from the king's table. This was a singular instance of conscientious temperance and self-denial in young persons, who had been brought up in affluence. (Marg. Ref. Note, Ex. ii. 21.)

them; and among them all was found none like Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah: [a] therefore stood they before the king.

20 And [b] in all matters of * wisdom and understanding that the king inquired of them, he found them [c] ten times better than all [d] the magicians and astrologers, that were in all his realm.

V. 17—20. It pleased God so to prosper the instructions given to Daniel and his friends, and their application to study; and so to communicate knowledge and wisdom from himself, that they far excelled their fellow students in every thing: and Daniel was early endued with the supernatural ability of interpreting remarkable dreams, as Joseph had been in Egypt; (for he alone was chosen to be a prophet.) So that when they were brought before the king, (who appears to have been a man of learning and penetration,) they were found far better qualified for his service than any of the other students; nay, they far excelled in learning and in the satisfactory solution of difficult questions, all the magicians and astrologers, and other pretenders to extraordinary discoveries, with which his realm abounded. They were therefore speedily advanced to honourable stations in his palace: and Daniel continued to be employed in the affairs of government, and to be regarded as a prophet, through the whole duration of the Chaldean monarchy; and till Cyrus succeeded to the kingdom, on the death of his father-in-law, Darius the Mede. Thus he lived to witness the conclusion of the seventy years, which Jeremiah had predicted as the term of the captivity: and there can be no reasonable doubt, but that Cyrus' favourable decree was procured by his means. Indeed it is evident that he survived that event at least two or three years, (x. 1.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The successes of ungodly men, even in their enterprises against the worshippers of God, are to be ascribed to his interposition: they could have no power against them, "except it were given them from above;" though they either take the glory of it to themselves, or give it to their idols. The Lord will permit his enemies to profane even those things which have been consecrated to his service, when they have been polluted by the hypocrisy or crimes of those who have been favoured with them. It is the prudence of princes to employ the abilities and endowments of body or mind, and every qualification natural or acquired, which are to be found among every class of their subjects: and it is the wisdom of God thus to bring forth into scenes of usefulness, those whom he hath qualified to serve the public, or his Church. He will sometimes have a few of his servants to stand in king's palaces, to direct the deliberations of senates, or to sway the affairs of kingdoms; as well as others to be employed in the work of the ministry, or in the obscure occupations of private life. We should therefore consider seriously what is our proper work, and do it diligently, and not censure others who aim to glorify God in a different sphere.—Youth is the time for acquiring useful knowledge; nor is it superfluous for those who most simply seek wisdom from God, to apply their minds, and to employ their time, in pursuing various kinds of human learning. Kings, who would have able statesmen and servants, should encourage literature, and support men of abilities in prosecuting their studies; for they will find but few disposed to such pursuits, except they have a prospect of being comfortably supported, nay, liberally rewarded. How careful then should parents be, so to train up their children, that they may be qualified for future usefulness! But, alas! the education which is generally patronized by royal or public bounty, tends more to corrupt men's principles and morals, than to improve them; and to lead them from scriptural sentiments, language, and behaviour, to adopt the names, notions, habits, and phraseology of heathens: and instead of teaching youth to bridle their passions, and to exercise self-denial, it commonly initiates them in luxury, or confirms them in habits of licentiousness.

V. 8—20.

If the Lord hath put it into the heart of any young person, from pure principles, to purpose not to defile himself by any unlawful or inexpedient indulgence, he will enable him to obtain the benefit, and to escape the dangers of every situation. But this will require much command over the appetites; and much firmness, meekness, and prudence will also be requisite, to avoid giving needless offence: for, even where conscience and duty are concerned, modest persuasion and entreaty are preferable to impetuosity, moroseness, and obstinacy. When the Lord sees good, he can bring his servants into favour and tender love even with strangers to true religion: and indeed the genuine spirit of Christianity, when connected with the meekness of wisdom and superior abilities, is exceedingly amiable and conciliating even in the eyes of ungodly men, where it does not interfere with their pride, lusts, and interests. They who first form salutary designs will seldom be left alone in them; though few in general will concur, compared with the numbers who prefer present indulgence or interest to duty. Temperance, nay, abstinence, is more consistent with health, than men are apt to believe, who seek excuses for self-indulgence. Yet there may be reasons, when a degree of abstemiousness is needful, which in other circumstances would not be proper. If this be undertaken by any man in the fear of God, and not from Pharisaical pride or affectation, or with a spirit of censoriousness; but either that he may not defile himself by an improper intercourse with ungodly men, or that he may keep under his body and bring it into subjection: he may expect a peculiar blessing on his spare diet, to support his health, and to fit him for active service; without burdening his conscience or "making provision "for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof." And though a regard to health is a general duty; yet there may be cases, when the care of keeping a conscience void of offence will render even this a subordinate consideration; which may in a measure be overlooked, upon the same principle that the offending right hand must be cut off, and that the martyr yields up his life rather than sin against God. When men see it necessary to purpose such designs in their hearts, and to mention them even to those who have a tender love for them, they will often find them a hinderance to their designs, out of fear, either respecting them, or on their own account. When, however, the trial is made, such fears are often found to have been mere temptatations: and conscientious temperance will always be found more beneficial, even to the comfort of this present life, than sinful indulgence. It also exceedingly tends to fit a man for study, or any great and continued mental exertion: and pious young men should endeavour to excel their fellows in every useful pursuit; not that they may be praised, but for the honour of the Gospel, and that they may be qualified for usefulness. For whatever station or service the Lord intends men, he will give them suitable endowments: and the wisdom that he bestows, is ten thousand times better than worldly policy, curious arts, or the most admired attainments of human learning; both for the management of secular concerns, and with respect to the eternal world. It is a happiness to the realm, and an honour to the prince, when he is competent to judge who are best qualified to serve him, and when he impartially prefers them on that account. A youth spent in temperance and piety, and in departing from evil, conduces to durable usefulness and eminency, and treasures up joys for the future, either on earth, or in heaven, or both. Let then young men keep their eyes steadily fixed on the examples of this chapter: let us all count every thing but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ, and the experience of his salvation; and always remember, that God will "honour those that honour him," but that they "who despise "him shall be lightly esteemed."

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. Nebuchadnezzar was king of Babylon when he came up to Jerusalem, and carried away Daniel and his friends to Babylon; which was in the first year of his reign: yet after Daniel had been three years educating, he is said to have had this dream in the second year of his reign. Hence it is concluded that he reigned some time along with his father; and that this was in the second year of his reigning alone. He was convinced that his dream was supernatural, and was troubled about it, though he could not recollect particulars: God so ordering it, that he might bring Daniel forth into notice, to make known his own glory, as the God of Israel and of the whole earth. 'Though it was but one dream, it contained 'divers scenes of affairs, being a description of the succession of the four monarchies, which were to continue, 'under different forms, to the end of the world.' (Lowth.) Rather the fourth will continue, in one form or other, till all the kingdoms of the world become the kingdom of Christ.

V. 2. 'The word rendered Sorcerers is always taken 'in an ill sense by the holy writers, for those who consult 'evil spirits. The Chaldeans were so much addicted to 'the study of the heavenly motions, and to make prognostications from thence; that the word Chaldean is used 'both in Greek and Latin writers for an astrologer.—'Daniel and his companions did not appear among them: 'perhaps the Chaldeans despised them as youths and strangers.' (Lowth.)

V. 4. In Syriac. Or, Chaldee: these were then the same language, or, as some think, the Syriac was a more elegant dialect of the Chaldee, chiefly used by the learned. From this verse to the end of the seventh chapter Daniel wrote in Chaldee, and not in Hebrew: probably in order to induce the Chaldeans to read the account of those transactions which so greatly concerned them. The expression, "O king live for ever," was a customary salutation, implying a cordial desire of his life, health, and permanent felicity; it was used by Daniel and other pious men, as well as by the heathens, though probably with more extensive meaning; and was equivalent to 'God save the king,' as in use among us. (Marg. Ref.)

5 The king answered and said to the Chaldeans, The thing is gone from me: if ye will not make known unto me the dream, with the interpretation thereof, ye shall be * cut in pieces, and your houses shall be [k] made a dunghill

6 But if ye shew the dream, and the interpretation thereof, [l] ye shall receive of me gifts and † rewards and great honour: therefore shew me the dream, and the interpretation thereof.

7 They answered again, and said, [m] Let the king tell his servants the dream, and we will shew the interpretation of it.

8 And the king answered and said, I ‡ know of certainty that ye would ‡ gain the time, because ye see the thing is gone from me.

9 But if ye will not make known unto me the dream, [n] there is but one decree for you: [o] for ye have prepared lying and corrupt words to speak before me till [p] the time be changed: therefore tell me the dream, and I shall know that ye can shew me the interpretation thereof.

10 The Chaldeans answered before the king, and said, There is not a man upon the earth that can shew the king's matter: therefore there is no king, lord, nor ruler, that asked such things at any magician, or astrologer, or Chaldean.

11 And it is a rare thing that the king requireth, [q] and there is none other that can shew it before the king, except the gods, [r] whose dwelling is not with flesh.

12 For [s] this cause the king was angry and very furious, and commanded to destroy all the wise men of Babylon.

13 And [t] the decree went forth that the wise men should be slain; [u] and they sought Daniel and his fellows to be slain.

14 ¶ Then Daniel § answered [x] with counsel and wisdom to Arioch the captain of the king's guard, which was gone forth to slay the wise men of Babylon:

15 He answered and said to Arioch the king's ‖ captain, Why is the decree so hasty from the king? Then Arioch [y] made the thing known to Daniel.

16 Then Daniel went in, [z] and desired of the king that he would give him time, and that he would shew the king the interpretation.

V. 5—9. Nothing could be more unreasonable than this demand of Nebuchadnezzar, or more tyrannical and cruel than the sentence annexed to it. The whole narration displays the arrogance, impetuosity, and violence of his character; and illustrates the evil tendency and fatal effect of arbitrary power, constant homage and flattery, and uninterrupted prosperity, on the mind of fallen man. Being eager to recover the recollection of his dream, he required of the wise men, what was impossible, except by revelation from God! And he threatened them with the most terrible death; with the deepest ignominy to their characters and family, if they did not immediately perform what he required: but if they did, he promised to reward them in the most liberal and honourable manner. When they reasonably desired to be informed of the dream, and promised to give the interpretation by the rules of their art, (which they never could have performed,) he construed this into a fraudulent intention of gaining time and opportunity for the execution of some corrupt design. Perhaps, being terrified by his dream, he expected some sudden revolution; and he might even suspect them of having formed some bad designs against him; so that he supposed they waited till the time was changed, and the event had deprived him of the power of punishing them: but he was determined to know it directly, or to execute his barbarous intentions. If they could discover the dream, it would give a sanction to their interpretation of it: but otherwise he should conclude them to be base impostors.

V. 10—13. The resolute conduct of the king led the Chaldeans and magicians, not only to confess the impotency of their arts, and to remonstrate that no king ever made such a demand on any who professed these sciences; but to declare that the discovery was beyond the reach of all human or created penetration, and only known and discoverable by the gods, whose dwelling was not with flesh, or among men. This they spoke of their gods: but the only living and true God, who alone could reveal the secrets contained in this dream, indeed condescends to dwell among men: and he actually made known the dream to Daniel, and so showed the difference betwixt JEHOVAH and his prophets, and the idols and magicians of Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar was the more exasperated by this reply, and immediately issued a decree to destroy all the wise men of Babylon: and whether in his inconsiderate rage he meant so, or whether he spoke in such general terms as to admit of this construction, Daniel and his fellows also were sought for to be put to death. Otherwise, the sorcerers would deservedly have been put to death, without rendering the city less wise than before. But the dream would have remained an impenetrable secret; which God had purposed it should not be.

V. 14—16. As Daniel and his friends had not been summoned with the other wise men; and yet were supposed to be involved with them in the condemnation pronounced against them, it was most reasonable, that they should have a hearing from the king. It seems that Daniel had, at times, access to him. Arioch appears to 17 Then Daniel went to his house, and made the thing known to [a] Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, his companions:

18 That [b] they would desire mercies * of the God of heaven concerning this secret; that † Daniel and his fellows should not perish with the rest of the wise men of Babylon.

19 Then [c] was the secret revealed unto Daniel [d] in a night vision. Then Daniel blessed the God of heaven.

20 Daniel answered and said, [e] Blessed be the name of God for ever and ever: [f] for wisdom and might are his:

21 And [g] he changeth the times and the seasons: [h] he removeth kings, and setteth up kings: [i] he giveth wisdom unto the wise, and knowledge to them that know understanding:

22 He [k] revealeth the deep and secret things: [l] he knoweth what is in the darkness, [m] and the light dwelleth with him.

23 I [n] thank thee, and praise thee, [o] O thou God of my fathers, [p] who hast given me wisdom and might, [q] and hast made known unto me now what we desired of thee: for thou hast now made known unto us the king's matter.

24 ¶ Therefore Daniel went in unto [r] Arioch, whom the king had ordained to destroy the wise men of Babylon: he went and said thus unto him, [s] Destroy not the wise men of Babylon: bring me in before the king, and I will shew unto the king the interpretation.

25 Then Arioch [t] brought in Daniel before the king in haste, and said thus unto him, ‡ I have found a man of § the captives of Judah, that will make known unto the king the interpretation.

26 The king answered and said to [u] Daniel, whose name was Belteshazzar, [x] Art thou able to make known unto me the dream which I have seen, and the interpretation thereof?

27 Daniel answered in the presence of the king, and said, The secret which the king hath demanded [y] cannot the wise men, the astrologers, the magicians, the soothsayers, shew unto the king:

28 But there is [z] a God in heaven [a] that revealeth secrets, and || maketh known to the king Nebuchadnezzar what shall be [b] in the latter days. Thy dream, and the visions of thy head upon thy bed, are these; have favoured his application; the king's fury was perhaps abated; and it pleased God to dispose his heart to regard the proposal of his servant. Daniel had before this understanding in dreams and visions, (i. 17:) but he would not have so confidently promised the desired information to the king, had he not received some intimation from God that it would in due time be communicated. No doubt, he was actuated by a zeal for the honour of God and of true religion, as well as by a desire of preserving his own life and that of his friends.

V. 17—23. After the united prayers of this pious company, the secret was revealed to Daniel, in so distinct and clear a manner, that he had no doubt of its being a divine inspiration, and that it would approve itself as such to Nebuchadnezzar. He therefore immediately praised God, as the Fountain of all wisdom and knowledge, and the Author of all those revolutions in empires, of which he had so vast a view before his mind, and which were to take place through a long succession of ages: and he rendered thanks and praise, in the most exalted language, to him for this extraordinary revelation, in a time of such imminent danger. 'His wisdom appears in ordering the 'great affairs of the world; and his might and power in 'bringing them to pass.' (Jer. xxxii. 19.) (Lowth.) The revelation made to Daniel, gave him not only wisdom, but power, to save many lives, and do immense good to his people.

V. 24. The rash decree of the king had doomed to one common destruction, not only the sorcerers, but all those in Babylon who were considered as wise and learned men: but Daniel was honoured as the willing instrument of preserving all their lives. The Lord, in answer to the benevolent prayers of him and his friends, spared the whole company. (Acts xxvii. 24.)

V. 25. 'Daniel undertook to do it, of his own accord: but this officer, according to the manner of courtiers, takes this opportunity of ingratiating himself with 'the king: as if the discovery of Daniel's abilities in 'this kind was owing purely to his diligence.' (Lowth.) revealed to me, for any wisdom that I have more than any living, [e] but for * their sakes that shall make known the interpretation to the king, [f] and that thou mightest know the thoughts of thy heart.

Indeed Arioch seems to have claimed some merit to himself; yet he also spoke as one that was glad to be excused from the bloody and odious service that had been assigned him.

31 ¶ Thou, O king, † sawest, and behold a great image. This great image, whose brightness was excellent, stood before thee; [g] and the form thereof was [h] terrible.

32 This image's [i] head was of fine gold, his [k] breast and his arms of silver, his [l] belly and his ‡ thighs of brass.

33 His [m] legs of iron, his feet part of iron and part of clay.

34 Thou sawest till that [n] a stone was [o] cut out § without hands, [p] which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and brake them to pieces.

35 Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces together, and became [q] like the chaff of the summer-threshing-floors; and the wind carried them away, that [r] no place was found for them: and the stone that smote the image [s] became a great mountain, [t] and filled the whole earth.

36 This is the dream; and [u] we will tell the interpretation thereof before the king.

37 Thou, O king, art [x] a king of kings: for [y] the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, [z] power, and strength, and glory.

V. 27—30. Daniel plainly told the king, that none of his wise men could possibly declare to him his dream; (thus gently intimating that his anger against them had been unreasonable:) but that the God of heaven revealed such secrets as he saw good; and that he had shown the king, by his disquieting dream, the events of future and distant ages. As for himself, he had not discovered this secret by his own extraordinary wisdom: but God had made it known to him, that he might interpret it to the king, in order that more favour might be shown to his people; and that the king might recollect and understand his own thoughts and dream, and be convinced that Israel's God was the only true and living Lord of all.

V. 31—33. This image made a splendid appearance before the imagination of Nebuchadnezzar, whose mind was attached to worldly magnificence: but the same events were afterwards represented to Daniel, under the appearance of fierce and devouring wild beasts; as the monarchies thus foretold were the great supporters of idolatry, tyranny, and persecution in the world. (Notes, 37—45.)

V. 34, 35. 'The Jews unanimously agree that by 'the stone is here meant the Messiah. His kingdom from 'small beginnings, should proceed to fill the whole earth; 'as if a stone could grow to a mountain. (Marg. Ref.) 'Mr. Mede has judiciously observed, that this kingdom is 'described here in two states, as the kingdom of the 'stone, and the kingdom of the mountain.' (Lowth.) The small and progressive success of Christianity is meant by the former: the universal triumph of it by the latter.

V. 36. Daniel modestly allows his friends a share in the honour of his discoveries; because they were made in answer to their united prayers.

V. 37. Nebuchadnezzar, proud of his extensive dominions and extraordinary prosperity, as having kings for his vassals and tributaries, and meeting with none, any where, who dared to resist him, would ascribe his greatness to his own valour and conduct: but Daniel reminded him, that the God of heaven had given him his kingdom, and all the glory and power of it.

V. 38. Thou art, &c. The Chaldean monarchy, over which Nebuchadnezzar was the only king of great renown, was represented in the vision by "the head of gold:" for monarchies under a succession of princes of the same nation, and not individual monarchs, are meant by kings in the general language of prophecy. The vast riches, magnificence, and prosperity of the Chaldean monarchy, and of Babylon its renowned metropolis, gave it that pre-eminence over the succeeding empires, which gold has above other metals: perhaps more liberty and peace were enjoyed under it, than under those which followed. The head of the image, being the emblem of this monarchy, seems only to denote its priority in order of time: but the term of its continuance was far shorter than that of any of the others. Some make the Assyrian empire, as swallowed up in the Chaldean, to be included under this part of the vision: but that was past, and therefore not the proper subject of prophecy. The transient dream which so soon vanished and was forgotten, and the lifeless image, were both emblems of the emptiness and vanity of all earthly glory.

V. 39. The breast, and the two arms of silver of the image, represented that monarchy which succeeded to the Chaldean; and this was the kingdom of the Medes and Persians, the united power and authority of which might be denoted by the two arms, shoulders, &c. This was inferior to the Chaldean monarchy, as silver is to gold, perhaps in wealth, splendour, and prosperity; at least it was so in the characters of the kings; for the Persian monarchs, from the death of Cyrus to the subversion of the monarchy, were perhaps as vile a set of men as ever disgraced human nature. The third kingdom, represented by the belly and thighs of the image, formed of brass, must be that of the Macedonians, or Grecians, which succeeded to the Persian monarchy. This was established by the conquests of Alexander the Great, and continued under his successors. It had less external magnificence than those which preceded; and it was founded and supported by force of arms, many of which were anciently made of brass: but it was more extensive than either of the others, including many dominions in Europe, as well as those of the Persians in Asia and Africa, and many regions further to the east, than they had ever penetrated. It was therefore foretold, that this kingdom would bear rule over all the earth; which may also allude to the vain-glorious boast of Alexander, that he had subdued the whole world. 'The Persians were not inferior in dignity, 'power, and riches; but were worse, touching ambition, 'cruelty, and all kinds of vice; showing that the world 'would grow worse and worse, till it was restored by 'Christ.'

V. 40—43. These verses evidently describe the Roman empire, as succeeding to that of the Macedonians. It was as strong as iron, and like iron it brake and subdued all before it. No people ever made such extensive conquests, through so many ages, as the Romans did: in the former part of their prosperity, they were remarkable only for valour, hardiness, frugality, and poverty, of which iron is a proper emblem. The two consuls by which they were long governed, and the eastern and western empires, into which their dominions were at length divided, might be denoted by the two legs and feet on which the image stood: and the ten toes, into which the feet divided, represented the ten kingdoms into which at length the whole empire was broken. The civil wars which weakened the state, and the conjunction of the Romans with the conquered nations, and afterwards with the Goths, Vandals, and other barbarians who subverted the empire, was denoted by the compounding of the iron with the potter's clay, which cannot unite or strengthen each other. Thus the Roman empire decayed in strength, even when it was growing more extensive: at length it began evidently to decline, till it was divided into many subordinate kingdoms. This is also represented by the Romans mingling themselves with the seed of men, or of other nations, by alliances and intermarriages, which tended to the subversion of the empire. Yet this monarchy still subsists in the toes, or kingdoms into which it was broken, and of which we shall hereafter have occasion to speak more particularly. (Marg. Ref.) 'The chief power in these ten 'kingdoms shall be partly secular, and partly ecclesiasti-'cal: and the encroaching of the ecclesiastical power upon 'the secular, shall be the occasion of frequent clashings 'between them, to the weakening of both parties, and 'endangering their breaking to pieces.' (Lowth.) These four monarchies, probably the mightiest which ever appeared on earth,) have certainly been far more celebrated than any others. The history of them, in fact, comprises the grand transactions of mankind from the days of Daniel to this present time. The Church of God likewise has had vastly more concern with these, than with any other empires; the countries belonging to them have hitherto been the chief seat of the Redeemer's kingdom, which will be rendered universal by the total subversion of the last of them. It cannot therefore be wondered, that so many more prophecies should be inserted in the sacred oracles, concerning these four kingdoms, than about other nations and empires.

V. 44, 45. In the days of those kings, or during the prevalence of the Roman authority, the God of heaven had determined to set up another kingdom, which would never be destroyed, or fall under the power of any conquerors; seeing it would break in pieces, and consume all these kingdoms, and stand for ever. This was represented by "a stone cut out without hands," which smote the image and utterly destroyed it, and became a great mountain that filled the whole earth. (Note, 34, 35.) The stone was entirely distinct from the image, nay, directly opposite to it and all its interests: it must therefore mean a kingdom set up by the power of God, without the concurrence of human policy or force, and in opposition 46 ¶ Then the king Nebuchadnezzar [m] fell upon his face, and worshipped Daniel, and commanded that they should offer an oblation, [n] and sweet odours unto him.

47 The king answered unto Daniel, and said, Of a truth it is, that your God is [o] a God of gods, and [p] a Lord of kings, and [q] a reveaier of secrets, seeing thou couldst reveal this secret.

48 Then the king made Daniel [r] a great man, and gave him many great gifts, and made him ruler over the whole province of Babylon, [s] and chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon.

49 Then Daniel requested of the king, and [u] he sat Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, over the affairs of the province of Babylon: but Daniel [x] sat in the gate of the king.

to all the authority and combined efforts of the princes of this world. The kingdom of Christ was evidently intended: from small beginnings, it hath already made a vast progress: it hath subverted, and will continue to subvert, Pagan and Antichristian kingdoms, and to entirely destroy and disperse them: and at length it will triumph over all opposition, and become a great mountain, and fill the whole earth. This part of the prophecy yet remains to be accomplished: so that we have in this dream a most extraordinary prophetical abstract of the most signal events, that would take place, through all succeeding ages, nearly to the consummation of all things. As far as the accomplishment hath proceeded, it hath been most exact and undeniable; and future ages shall be filled with astonishment and awe, by witnessing this Stone, cut out without hands, destroying the remaining toes of this image, and universally triumphant. Thus the great God made known to this heathen prince what was afterwards to come to pass; and the dream was certain, and the interpretation thereof sure.

V. 46–49. Nebuchadnezzar was so astonished by Daniel's so exactly declaring his dream, and showing him such wonderful events couched under it, that he thought him a deity, and attempted to render him adoration with sacrifices and incense. Doubtless Daniel withdrew him from his purpose, and informed him more fully, to whom the honour was due; upon which he acknowledged the God of Daniel to be "a God of gods," &c. Yet he seems not to have been convinced, that it was necessary for him to renounce idolatry, and to become his worshipper and servant. He however greatly preferred and enriched Daniel, and at his request he preferred his companions also; but Daniel became one of his chief ministers. No doubt they accepted of these preferments, in hopes of rendering some service to their people and religion, as well as of doing some general good to mankind. Hence it is plain, that hitherto there were no religious tests or observances required by the king, previous to their admission to places of trust and authority.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

No greatness or prosperity can secure so much as an undisturbed night's sleep; and when the Lord pleases he can render men miserable even by uneasy dreams. He hath various methods of making known his purposes; in order to manifest his own glory, to draw men's attention to his servants, and to evidence the authenticity of his sacred oracles. Men are generally more eager to gratify their curiosity, or to dive into futurity, than to learn the way of salvation or the path of duty: yet all foreknowledge of future events tends to increase anxiety and trouble; except as it is counterpoised by submission to the will, and confidence in the wisdom, truth, and love of God. They who attend on the courts of princes, learn the language of benevolence: but the most emphatical wishes of health, life, or salvation, are frequently unmeaning compliments, which run counter to the real desires of their hearts. Yet Christians may often use the same words in sincerity; praying for kings and all in authority, that they may properly fill up their high stations on earth, and also live for ever in the felicity of heaven. It is a great evil, when multitudes are subjected to the arbitrary sway of one capricious and haughty tyrant, who may imperiously command the most absurd and impossible things; who having been long humoured, can brook no denial or delay; and who deals about death, without feeling or remorse, on the most inoffensive of his subjects. Such rulers are generally extremely jealous and suspicious, and apt to misconstrue the most reasonable actions or expressions into rebellion and treason: and the rewards that they confer when gratified, are a very inadequate counterbalance for the miseries they inflict when enraged; in which they generally involve the innocent with the guilty. We should therefore be thankful to live under a limited monarchy, in which our sovereign is authorized and enabled to do as much good as he will, but has no legal power of doing injustice. Yet we should remember that God is just, even when men are most unjust; and that they who fall victims to the cruel jealousy of unreasonable tyrants, often on other accounts deserve their doom. The Lord also orders every event, as may best detect the folly and imposture of those varied delusions, which succeed one another in the world, and the insufficiency of all human power, wisdom, and penetration: that by the confession even of those who oppose his truth, when baffled in their devices, it may appear, that the discoveries he makes and the operations he performs, are impossible to all others. But the views of the most sagacious of ungodly men are strangely confused, in respect of the glorious Lord of all; they have a faint idea of his pre-eminence, and of some of his perfections: but his majesty and mercy, his exaltation and condescension, his dwelling with human flesh to save and bless sinful men, and all the glories displayed in the great work of redemption, are wholly hidden from them: and they are more apt to conceive of God as distant, and as not interfering in the affairs of men; than to suppose that not "a sparrow falls to the ground," nor "a hair from "our heads without him."

V. 14—30.

The furious rage of men who cannot, or will not distinguish between "the pure, peaceable, and holy wisdom "which is from above," and that "which is earthly, "sensual, and devilish," may involve the servants of God under the same condemnation with the vilest impostors; but he knows how to rescue them, and even to make their dangers the means of their greatest good. He directs them to a gentle and cautious deportment in the midst of the greatest injuries and perils: but whatever methods they adopt for retarding the purposes, or pacifying the rage, of wicked men; their grand means is to excite one another to prayer for mercies to the God of heaven, who is able to extricate them from every difficulty, and to keep them from perishing with the wicked. "The secret of the LORD "is with them that fear him:" and though we do not expect such immediate revelations from God as Daniel was favoured with: yet he will answer our believing prayers for direction in every perplexity, show us whatever is for our good, and turn our fears and sorrows into grateful praises. Every renewed mercy should lead us to renew our adorations: we should remember the glorious perfections of our God, the honour of his kingdom, and the wise and righteous dispensations of his providence, who changes times and seasons, and removeth and setteth up kings: we should celebrate him as the Giver of knowledge and wisdom, as knowing what is in the darkness, and dwelling in inaccessible light; whilst we thank him for the favours bestowed on us, and for granting us the instruction, help, and encouragement, that we sought from him in our tribulations. But when the Lord peculiarly honours us before men, we must be sure to remember and acknowledge, that it is not for our sakes, but for his name's sake, and for the benefit of his Church, and for the conviction of his enemies, that there is indeed a God in heaven, that can reveal such secrets, and perform such works, as it never entered into the heart of the wisest man to conceive possible: of this the prophecies contained in the sacred scriptures, and fulfilling through the successive ages of the world, are a full demonstration to every considerate mind.

V. 31—49.

The most powerful and renowned empires, that have been erected on earth, are but as the baseless fabric of a disjointed vision, which vanisheth when we awake: they may excel in brightness and be very terrible, but they are only a vain pageant of glory and excellency; for these are substantially to be found in God and heavenly things alone. The kings and conquerors of the earth have in every age kept the nations in an uproar, by their ambitious projects, and the revolutions which they have occasioned. Some have been more eminent for wealth, some for power, some for hardy courage and ruinous success; their delight has been in destroying, subduing, breaking in pieces, and crushing mankind: one form of tyranny hath often been superseded by another still more base and barbarous: and men in general have been groaning under the effects of their contests and vices! But all human power and prowess tend to decay: many mighty empires have gradually been weakened, till they have been subverted by open enemies, or by intestine convulsions. In the midst of all these events the God of heaven is setting up his kingdom, not by human might or power, but by his word and Spirit. This does not interfere with the proper exercise of any human authority: but it will, by its secret operation, overturn and destroy all opposing or intervening power, break in pieces every antichrist, fill the earth, and continue for ever.—May we be the willing subjects of this kingdom, and spend our lives in seeking its peace and prosperity! It is natural for men to run into extremes; and either to despise and injure, or to idolize, those who speak the word of God to them: but our business is to direct their attention to the great Author and Giver of every good gift. Many have some general apprehensions of the power and majesty of God, and that others ought to serve him, who yet have no serious thoughts of worshipping him themselves. He, however, over-rules even such convictions to bring his servants into those stations, in which they are to be employed: and they may consistently accept the favours offered them, when they give them an opportunity of doing good, and are not clogged with any sinful conditions. It behooves those who are advanced to be mindful of their former friends; but far more to use their influence in promoting the wise and righteous, that God may be glorified, and the best interests of mankind furthered by them.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—7. It is not certain at what time the events of this chapter occurred. The Septuagint indeed says, that it was in the eighteenth year, that is, after Nebuchadnezzar's prophetical dream. Some think that Nebuchadnezzar had a reference in this image to that which he had seen; as if he would have one wholly of gold, and not be contented with being represented by the head of gold. It seems more probable that the impression of his dream was worn off, and his ambition and arrogance still further increased by success; that his attachment to idolatry was augmented by his victories over the people of JEHOVAH; and that this image was formed from the spoils of the conquered nations. It was of an enormous size, and must have cost immense treasure. The height of it was above thirty yards; but this being ten times its breadth or thickness, and out of all proportion, favours the conclusion, that the pedestal also on which it stood was taken in under the admeasurement. It was perhaps made hollow, but with plates of solid gold; and it was set up in an extensive plain near Babylon, which could contain a vast concourse of people, and was probably erected in honour of Bel, the chief idol of Babylon. Having completed the image, in order to render the worship of it more noticed, and to make the greater ostentation of his own magnificence and authority, Nebuchadnezzar summoned all his officers, civil and military, from every part of his extensive dominions, to attend on its dedication. When met together upon the plain, they were ordered by proclamation to fall down and worship this new made deity, of whatever nation they were: the signal for this act of adoration by the striking up of all kinds of musical instruments at once, might be intended to allure them by soothing strains to join in the worship, and inspire fervour into their supposed devotion. But to secure uniformity in this vast company, it was also proclaimed that every one who refused compliance, should immediately be cast into a burning fiery furnace. It does not appear that any were obliged to attend, who did not hold places under government: others would doubtless be there, and then they must comply; but these were constrained to be present, at a vast trouble and expense from every part of the empire: so that it was a sort of religious test, by which they were to approve themselves proper persons to be employed in the king's service; and as it is common on such occasions, there was a general conformity observed. Almost every person concerned was so overawed by the menaces and power of the king, or so allured by the hopes of ingratiating themselves with him: or so devoid of principle, knowledge, or conscience: or so attached to a pompous idolatry, that they unanimously observed the signal, and prostrated themselves in adoration of the golden image.—The several words, by which the different officers, and the various kinds of musical instruments, are enumerated, seem not to admit of any satisfactory explanation: for, without referring to ancient usages, they cannot be distinctly made intelligible, except to those few who are fully acquainted with those usages, and perhaps scarcely even to them.—'The idol is not known for an idol, so long as he is 'with the workman: but when the ceremonies and cus-'toms are recited and used, and the consent of the people 'is there: then of a block they think they have made a 'god.'

worshippeth, that he should be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace.

12 There are [a] certain Jews whom thou hast set over the affairs of the province of Babylon, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego; these men, O king, have * not regarded thee: they serve not thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up.

13 Then Nebuchadnezzar [o] in his rage and fury commanded to bring Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. [p] Then they brought these men before the king.

14 Nebuchadnezzar spake and said unto them, Is it † true, O Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, do not ye serve [q] my gods, nor worship the golden image which I have set up?

15 Now if ye be ready that at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, and all kinds of music, ye fall down and worship the image which I have made; [r] well: but if ye worship not, ye shall be cast the same hour into the midst of a burning fiery furnace; and who is that God that shall deliver [t] you out of my hands?

16 Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego answered, and said to the king, O Nebuchadnezzar, [u] we are not careful to answer thee in this matter.

17 If it be so, [v] our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and he will deliver us out of thine hand, O king.

18 But if not, [x] be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up.

V. 8—12. Many opinions have been held, concerning the way in which Daniel escaped on this occasion. The silence of the scripture, as well as the excellency of his character, sufficiently prove that he did not worship the golden image: for, the same impartiality which caused David's adultery and murder, and Solomon's idolatry to be recorded, would have reported Daniel's sin, if on this occasion he had been overcome by temptation. He might be elsewhere employed about the king's business, and be dispensed with in his absence: or he might refuse to worship the image; yet his enemies might fear beginning with him, choosing to prepare the way for his ruin, as they supposed, by first attacking his friends. It seems, however, that Shadrach and his two friends chose rather to make this public protest against idolatry than to absent themselves. The Chaldean accusers appear to have been influenced in part by enmity to the Jewish religion, and zeal for idolatry; and still more by envy and indignation at the preferment bestowed on strangers, and by a hope of succeeding to their places. It is probable that no other Jews were employed in offices under the king; or it must be supposed, degenerate as they were, more would have been found that refused compliance with the decree.—The accusers represented, that three of the captive Jews, who had been graciously promoted by the king, had proved themselves ungrateful for his favour, by contemptuously disobeying his will; as if they had despised the king's authority, and were influenced by a spirit of obstinate rebellion, rather than conscientiousness, in refusing to worship the golden image. Thus they both paid court to Nebuchadnezzar, and misrepresented the behaviour of these young men, in order to irritate him against them. 'This 'is the more intolerable, for that they have dared to affront 'thee, in that very province, the charge of which thou hast 'committed unto them.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 13—15. Nebuchadnezzar had formerly found these persons "ten times better than all his magicians and 'astrologers;" and he had employed them, and found them faithful and able. He could not but know, that the laws of their religion forbade them to worship any image, and that they acted consistently in refusing obedience. Yet his imperious temper would not endure the least opposition, but he was enraged even to fury, when he heard of their conduct; and having cited them before him, and renewed his orders, that when the music should again play, they should prostrate themselves in worship before his golden image, and his menace of the fiery furnace; he set their God, and "all that was called god or worshipped," at defiance, by emphatically inquiring who "that God was, "that was able to deliver them out of his hand;" though he had heretofore acknowledged JEHOVAH to be a God of gods, and a Lord of kings! 'Thus Nebuchadnezzar ex-'alted himself above God almighty, as Sennacherib had 'done before him.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.) The question which he proposed to them means, 'Did ye this on 'set-purpose, and with deliberate determination,' &c.

V. 16—18. This answer hath a peculiar beauty and propriety. The accused persons uttered no outrageous language against the idols of Babylon, or the iniquity of this sanguinary edict; and they used no soothing address, mean supplications, or flattering expressions, to mollify the king's displeasure: but they calmly assured the king, that they were no way perplexed about the answer they should return to him; they had made up their minds; they wanted no time for deliberation; they were not anxious about the consequences; but they were ready in few words to state their determination. If it were so, that he should cast them into the furnace, that God whom they worshipped was able to deliver them. Of this it seems they had some expectation; either because of the numbers who would witness the contest betwixt JEHOVAH and this haughty idolater; or because of the bold defiance of God which he had uttered. If therefore the Almighty saw good, he would deliver them out of the hand of the king; but if he should not please thus miraculously to interpose, they were not solicitous about the event; but would have him to 19 Then [y] was Nebuchadnezzar * full of fury, and [z] the form of his visage was changed against Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego: therefore [a] he spake, and commanded that they should heat the furnace [b] one seven times more [c] than it was wont to be heated.

20 And he commanded the † most mighty men that were in his army [d] to bind Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, and to cast them into the burning fiery furnace.

21 Then these men were bound in their ‡ coats, their hosen, and their § hats, and their other garments, and were cast into the midst of the burning fiery furnace.

22 Therefore, because the king's ‖ commandment was urgent, and the furnace exceeding hot, the * flame of the fire [e] slew those men that took up Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego.

23 And these three men, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, [f] fell down bound into the midst of the burning fiery furnace.

24 ¶ Then Nebuchadnezzar the king was [g] astonied, and rose up in haste, and spake, and said unto his † counsellors, Did not we cast three men bound into the midst of the fire? They answered and said unto the king, True, O king.

25 He answered and said, Lo, I see four men loose, [h] walking in the midst of the fire, and ‡they have no hurt; and the form of the fourth is like [i] the Son of God.

26 Then Nebuchadnezzar came near to the § mouth of the burning fiery furnace, and spake, and said, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, [k] ye servants of the most high God, [l] come forth, and come hither. Then Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, came forth of the midst of the fire.

27 And [m] the princes, governors, and captains, and the king's counsellors, being gathered together, saw these men, [n] upon whose bodies the fire had no power, [o] nor was an hair of their head singed, neither were their coats changed, nor the smell of fire had passed on them.

know, that they would on no account at any time worship any of his gods, or now adore his golden image. When we consider the situation of these men; that they were strangers and captives, at a distance from the land and ordinances of God, and without any to countenance or encourage them; that they had been under great obligations to the king; that most of their countrymen, even when in their own land, were given up to idolatry; that they were not required to abjure the God of Israel, or to enter upon a constant course of idolatry, but merely in one instance to comply with the king's humour; and in such remarkable circumstances, when the whole empire was against them, and the fiery furnace before them: I say, when these things are duly considered, we shall perceive, that this instance of heroic constancy and intrepidity in a good cause, was scarcely ever equalled, and never was exceeded, by any mere man, since the beginning of the world. The language commonly used, and the pictures formed on this subject, have led people to think of these persons as children: but it seems far more probable, that they were in the full vigour of manhood, above thirty years of age, when this event took place.

V. 19—23. The decisive answer, returned by these pious Jews, threw the proud tyrant into the utmost excess of rage, which appeared in the perturbation of his countenance. To show his indignation at the supposed atrociousness of their conduct, he ordered the heat of the furnace to be increased seven-fold; which would only have shortened and lessened their torture, if the Lord had left them to be consumed in the flames. He selected the mightiest of his soldiers to cast them into the furnace; and bound them with their clothes on, as if he would secure the destruction of all that belonged to them. Thus they were cast bound into this tremendous furnace of fire, at the time when it was heated to that extreme degree, that the executioners were slain by the vehement flame which issued out of it. It is not improbable that they had been forward to comply with the king's orders, and to show their malice against the Jews; and thus they fell victims to their own evil dispositions. Every circumstance, however, served to illustrate the greatness of the miracle, in the preservation of those who fell down bound into the fiery furnace.

V. 24, 25. Some think that Nebuchadnezzar was astonished by the death of his mighty men, or by the terrors of his conscience: but it is more likely, that he saw at a distance the young men walking loose in the fiery furnace. It seems, that it was large enough to admit of their walking about in it, and was probably formed like those in which lime is at present burned. He called his counsellors to witness this astonishing incident: they had thrown three men bound into the fire; but now four were walking about, in the midst of the furnace; and the fourth was so glorious that he was like to a Son of God, or a holy angel. The fire, it seems, had power to burn their bonds, though not to singe their garments: they found no inconvenience, and felt no terror in the midst of this most vehement fire, nor any desire to come forth from it; they probably were employed in thankful praise and adoration of their great Deliverer, though the song ascribed to them in the Apocrypha is not genuine: and, whatever the king might mean by the fourth person being like the Son of God; it is probable, that it was indeed the eternal and coequal Son of the Father, and not a created angel. (Marg. Ref.)

28 Then Nebuchadnezzar spake, and said, [p] Blessed be the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, who hath sent [q] his angel, and delivered his servants [r] that trusted in him, [s] and have changed the king's word, and yielded their bodies, that they might not [t] serve nor worship any god, except their own God.

29 Therefore * I make a decree, That every people, nation, and language, which speak any thing † amiss against [u] the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, shall be ‡ cut in pieces, and their houses shall be made a dunghill; [x] because there is no other God that can deliver after this sort.

30 Then [y] the king § promoted Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, in the province of Babylon.

V. 26, 27. When the king had viewed this surprising scene, he was convinced of his error, and altered his conduct: he called to the pious Jews, by the honourable appellation of "the servants of the most high God," and ordered them to come forth. None could fetch them out, nor would they quit their place without being called from it. But they then came forth; and all the multitude of the chief persons, from every part of the empire, who witnessed the transaction, collected together to examine them; and found, to their unspeakable astonishment, that the fire had no power at all over their bodies, or even any effect upon their raiment. Thus they would be prepared to return to their several homes, and to circulate and authenticate in every province, the account of this wonderful interposition of the God of Israel in behalf of his faithful worshippers. And we cannot but suppose, that it had a happy effect upon the minds of many individuals, and tended to check the progress of idolatry, and to promote the worship of the living God.

V. 28, 29. This transaction seems to have produced deep convictions in the mind of Nebuchadnezzar: insomuch, that at the time he rendered adoration before all his princes to the God of Israel, who had sent his Angel to deliver his servants: he allowed, that they had done right in trusting in the Lord; and in rather yielding up their bodies to the flame, than worship any other but their own God. And (as if he were resolved at all events to be a persecutor,) he decreed most terrible punishments to those, who dared to speak a word against the God of Shadrach, &c.; seeing no other God could deliver after that manner. But his convictions were transient, his pride was unhumbled; and no abiding change at this time took place in his disposition and conduct; as will appear from the extraordinary narration of the ensuing chapter.

V. 30. The Septuagint adds at the end of this verse, 'And he advanced them to be governors over all the Jews 'that were in his kingdom.' That translation, indeed, contains, in this chapter, several circumstances, which are not in the original; while the death of the mighty men, who cast Shadrach, &c. into the furnace, is omitted.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

Ungodly men commonly spare no cost in gratifying their pride and lusts; and the devotees of idolatry and superstition are often equally profuse about their false worship: surely then the servants of God should not be niggardly in showing their attachment to his cause and service! Pride and bigotry combine in disposing princes to require from their subjects conformity to their religion, whether right or wrong: and, alas! there are but few in comparison, even among professed Christians, that can give a much better reason for their religious observances, than the Babylonians could for worshipping the golden image which the king had set up! When worldly interest allures, and sanguinary statutes terrify, seldom any great number will refuse compliance; but fear, or hope, will procure the golden image far more worshippers, than will adhere to the God of heaven! Such conformity and uniformity, are perfectly easy to the slothful, the careless, the sensual, and the infidel, that is, to a vast majority in most communities; whose worship, if paid at all, springs more from habit, interest, love of ease, or desire of obtaining the ruler's favour, than from regard to the authority and commandments of God. Satan hath ever studied to entice men into antiscriptural modes of worship by external splendour, and whatever could enchant the senses, enliven the imagination, or move the affections: and even music, though consecrated to the service of the sanctuary, and capable of good improvement in subserviency to devotion; has been, and is often, wretchedly abused to the vilest purposes: it should therefore be used in religious ordinances with jealousy and caution, lest it should produce a false fervour, and subserve the cause of vice, delusion, superstition, or enthusiasm.

V. 8—23.

Whilst the multitude, in every age, nation, and rank in society, are servile in compliance with the will of their superiors, and ready to obey any laws about religion, which can conduce to their outward ease, safety, or emolument, without fear of God or regard to conscience; there will be a few witnesses for the truth in the most degenerate times, who will dare to be singular, and to venture all consequences in obeying God rather than man. These will be sure to meet with malicious accusers; especially if the liberty, favour, or property they enjoy, be worth envying, or coveting. Their enemies will pretend to be the only loyal and dutiful subjects to their prince, and to be zealous for his welfare, the honour of the law, and the quiet of the realm: and they will represent the pious scruples of the servants of God, as arising from contumacy, contempt of authority, and disaffection to the government, and as deserving of the severest punishment denounced by the most cruel laws. They will not, if they can help it, let such statutes remain unexecuted; and they will plead, that if the religious tenets of the persecuted do not deserve punishment, yet their obstinacy and contempt of legal authority do. Thus princes have often been wrought up to the highest pitch of rage and fury against their most useful and inoffensive subjects, and their most faithful servants: and Christians have been dragged as the vilest malefactors before kings and rulers; and put to the dreadful alternative, either to risk the everlasting wrath of God by deliberate disobedience to his commandments, or to suffer every torture that the infernal rage and cruelty of man could devise. They who have been long accustomed to be obeyed with unreserved servility, and to overpower all opposition, can often scarcely conceive of a power above them, or a God able to deliver his servants out of their hands: but their impious boasts and proud menaces are real kindnesses to the persecuted, who need not be careful or fearful, in answering under such circumstances. Indeed these fiery trials will not suit the superficial or hypocritical; their fear of man, and love of the world, and want of fear or love to God, and above all, their want of faith, will concur in rendering them apostates in the time of temptation. Nor will every real believer be able to stand with serene and unshaken fortitude, when first cast into such a trying situation. But the Lord will strengthen his people's faith in the time of need: and a firm reliance on the divine wisdom, power, truth, and mercy, together with peace of conscience, and an assured joyful hope of heaven, will gradually compose their minds, and determine them to venture all consequences rather than sin against the Lord. He is as able as ever to preserve the lives of his servants, in the most imminent perils, to support them under the most exquisite sufferings, and abundantly to recompense all their losses for his sake. A firm persuasion of these truths will fortify the soul against temptations to prevaricate, or to be ashamed of Christ: for no plea of necessity, danger, obligation, or example, will be sufficient, if we deliberately break God's commandments for the sake of temporal safety or advantage. We should be meek in our replies, "not rendering railing for railing," for "the "wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God:" but we must also be decisive, that we will obey God rather than man, and take the consequences.

V. 24—30.

A firm and resolute conduct, however calm and prudent, will greatly enrage proud persecutors, whose furious countenances both show the misery of being the slaves of their own passions, and prove whose children they are, and what master they serve; but this does not render them more to be feared; for at most they can only kill the body, and by increasing the intenseness, they decrease the duration of the sufferings that they inflict, and only expose their own folly and impotency. But what unknown guilt have persecutors to answer for! The crimes of their numerous instruments will in some sense be chargeable on them: and the souls of the murderers, (if not their lives also,) as well as the blood of the murdered, will be required at their hands. It must then be infinitely dangerous to all, whether principals or accessaries, to meddle with this diabolical business: and could we see into the eternal world, we should behold the persecuted believer safe from the malice of his foes: and the willing executioners of the unjust rage of persecutors, enduring the wrath of God in unquenchable fire. The Lord can render every furnace of affliction, and the bed of death, nay, the rack, or the flames, the scenes of sweet communion betwixt him and his people. Their sufferings only tend to loosen their bonds, and to set them at liberty from sin and the world: they may be comfortable in any situation, by the manifested presence of the Son of God; and this may be so evident, as even to fill their persecutors with astonishment and dismay. The Lord can soon convince the most proud that he is above them, and show them the madness and folly of their rebellion: he will effectually "cause the wrath of man to turn to his "praise, and restrain the remainder of it:" he can extort adorations even from his enemies; and make all men see how wise, safe, and happy they are, who adhere to his service, in seasons of peculiar danger and difficulty. He can make those instrumental in stopping the mouths of blasphemers, and in promoting the knowledge of his great name, who have no real love to him: and he can render the sufferings of his people conducive to their temporal as well as eternal good. "O LORD God of hosts, blessed is "the man, who putteth his trust in thee!" Finally, let us remember, that he, who preserved these pious Jews in the fiery furnace, is able to uphold us in the hour of sharp temptation, to keep us from falling into sin, in the most unfavourable circumstances, and "to present us "faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding "joy."

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. This chapter no doubt contains the exact words of Nebuchadnezzar's proclamation, which Daniel was directed to insert in his prophecy; and thus it received the sanction of divine inspiration. Nebuchadnezzar was induced to send the wonderful narrative of those things that had happened to him, connected with his sentiments concerning them, into every part of his extensive dominions, whilst he was under that impression of divine things which they had made upon his mind.—We have repeatedly found this haughty monarch under some general convictions, concerning the pre-eminent power and majesty of JEHOVAH; yet it was also evident, that there was no gracious change in his disposition and conduct: but the beginning and the conclusion of this chapter lead us, at least, to hope that he was at last made a monument of the victorious power of divine grace, and the exceeding riches of divine mercy. Without any such pompous additions to his name, and style of king, as were generally customary: (Ezra vii. 12;) he addressed himself to all the inhabitants of the earth, meaning chiefly, but not exclusively, those of his own dominions. He began by wishing them peace, as the sum of all earthly blessings; which is the more observable, as he had spent his life in embroiling them in wars: he deemed it good thus publicly to declare the miraculous dealings of God with him; it was proper, reasonable, becoming, and useful: and he concluded with breaking out into admiration of the greatness and power of the wonderful works of the Lord, and an acknowledgment of his everlasting authority and kingdom. If we consider Nebuchadnezzar's previous character, and the most humiliating and distressing calamity which the chapter records, we shall be convinced that sullen silence, or outrageous blasphemy, was more to be expected from him, than such an adoration as this, of that God who had so exposed and abased him.

V. 4—7. 'God's particular judgment often resembles 'the general one, in coming suddenly and unexpectedly, when men indulge themselves in carnal security.'—(Lowth.) After Nebuchadnezzar had successfully finished his wars, and the vast improvements and buildings which he made at Babylon, of which many authors have written copiously and as men filled with astonishment; he had uninterrupted peace, rest, and prosperity in his palace, and probably expected to end his days in tranquil enjoyment: but he was suddenly alarmed by a remarkable dream, and by his thoughts upon his bed concerning it. According to custom, therefore, he published an edict, commanding the attendance of all his wise men, that they might interpret the dream to him: but, though on a former occasion they had promised to interpret his dream if he would declare it to them; yet they were not able at this time to do it. Perhaps they thought that some calamity was foreboded, but not being able to determine any thing distinctly about it, they did not choose to risk the consequence of a conjectural interpretation, but rather to submit to the disgrace of not being able to interpret it, as no other punishment was denounced.

V. 8, 9. Whether the king consulted the other wise men to prove them, before he applied to Daniel; or whether he would rather have received the desired information from them, than from him; he could scarcely avoid recollecting, that Daniel had formerly shown him both his dream and the interpretation of it. In relating this conference he observed, that Daniel was also called Belteshazzar, according to the name of his god, Bel, or Belus; as he had formerly worshipped this idol as his god, though when he wrote this he worshipped the God of heaven; (37;) and that in Daniel was the Spirit of the holy Gods, or of the Holy God: the name of God being plural in the Hebrew, though generally used with a singular adjective or verb. He next noticed, that he had addressed Daniel, as the master of the magicians; as being pre-eminent among all the reputedly wise men of Babylon: for he had not at that time learned to distinguish betwixt a prophet of the Lord and these impostors, except as he deemed Daniel more skilful than they. Convinced, however, that he spake by the Spirit of the holy Gods, or the Lord God of Israel, and that no secret was so concealed from him, as to occasion him any perturbation of mind, he earnestly desired him to interpret his visions.

the fruit thereof much, and in it was meat for all: [s] the beasts of the field had [t] shadow under it, and [u] the fowls of the heaven dwelt in the boughs thereof, and all flesh was fed of it.

13 I saw [x] in the visions of my head upon my bed, and, behold, [y] a watcher and [z] an holy One came down from heaven;

14 He cried * aloud, and said thus, [a] Hew down the tree, and cut off his branches; shake off his leaves, and scatter his fruit; [b] let the beasts get away from under it, and the fowls from his branches.

15 Nevertheless, [c] leave the stump of his roots in the earth, even with a band of iron and brass, in the tender grass of the field; and let it be wet with the dew of heaven, and let his portion be with the beasts in the grass of the earth.

16 Let his heart [d] be changed from man's, and let a beast's heart be given unto him; and let [e] seven times pass over him.

17 This matter is [f] by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of [g] the holy ones: to the intent [h] that the living may know that [i] the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it [k] the basest of men.

18 This dream I king Nebuchadnezzar have seen. Now thou, O Belteshazzar, declare the interpretation thereof, [l] forasmuch as all the wise men of my kingdom are not able to make known unto me the interpretation: [m] but thou art able; for the Spirit of the holy Gods is in thee.

19 ¶ Then [n] Daniel, whose name was Belteshazzar, [o] was astonied for one hour, and his thoughts troubled him. The king spake, and said, Belteshazzar, [p] let not the dream, or the interpretation thereof, trouble thee. Belteshazzar answered and said, My lord, [q] the dream be to them that hate thee, and the interpretation thereof to thine enemies.

V. 10—18. As the king lay asleep, he dreamed that he saw a tree, in the centre of the earth, (conceiving of it as of a wide extended plain;) of so enormous a height and size, that its top reached to heaven, and it was visible to the extremity of the earth. This tree was covered with an exuberance of beautiful leaves, and loaded with immense quantities of fruit; its branches formed a covert for the beasts of the field, and places for the nests of the fowls of the air, and all the inhabitants of the earth fed upon its fruit. This represented the exceedingly prosperous condition of Nebuchadnezzar, the height of his exaltation, the extent of his dominions and renown, the splendour of his kingdom, the multitude of his subjects who received protection from him, and the peace and plenty which they enjoyed under his administration. (Marg. Ref.) He then saw a watcher and a holy One, either a holy angel, or a divine person, who was called a watcher, as watching over the affairs of men, (23, 24.) who spake with great authority and energy, and as one giving orders to his servants, to hew down the tree, &c: yet, when the branches, leaves, and fruit should be destroyed or scattered, and the beasts and fowls driven away, the stump of the tree was to be preserved in the earth, as if girt round with iron and brass, being overgrown with grass, and wet with the dew of heaven. Here a transition was made from the tree, to Nebuchadnezzar, who was represented by it; the tree being lost sight of, a person came in its stead; (as the imagination in dreams frequently passes from one thing to another, in a wild and incoherent manner.) This person was represented as living on the grass of the field, as wetted with the dew of heaven, as having his portion with the beasts; and as having lost the heart or disposition of a man; being estranged from the pursuits, employments, and manners of life peculiar to the human species, and fitted to associate with the beasts of the field. Thus he would continue, till seven times or years passed over him; and then this condition would be terminated, and he restored to his former capacities and situation. All this would take place by the decree of the watchers, and by the demand of the holy Ones, which some understand of the holy angels, the ministers of Providence; who obtained from God this decree, and commission to carry it into execution, for the manifestation of the divine glory in abasing this proud man. Others by holy ones understand the saints of God, true believers, in answer to whose earnest prayers for deliverance from oppression, this decree was made. But some think that the "Holy, Holy, Holy Lord God of Hosts," the triune Jehovah, was meant by the watchers and the Holy Ones: and indeed Daniel's interpretation gives great sanction to this opinion: as he says that "this was the "decree of the most High," (23, 24.) By his appointment this event would take place, and be notified to all that lived on the earth, that they might know, that the most High was the ruler in the kingdom of men; that he was above the mightiest monarchs, and disposed of them and their dominions as he pleased: and that he frequently placed over them the meanest and basest of men. This dream Nebuchadnezzar desired Daniel to interpret; as he, and he alone, could do it, by the inspiration of the Spirit of God.

V. 19. When Daniel had heard this dream, and perceived what a terrible calamity was coming on his prince and benefactor, for whom he had a benevolent regard; and when he considered the painful, and even perilous service imposed on him, of declaring this terrible message from God to a man of so impetuous and violent a temper; he was greatly astonished, and kept silence for an hour

20 The [r] tree that thou sawest, which grew, and was strong, whose height reached unto the heaven, and the sight thereof to all the earth;

21 Whose leaves were fair, and the fruit thereof much, and in it was meat for all; under which the beasts of the field dwelt, and upon whose branches the fowls of the heaven had their habitation:

22 It is [s] thou, O king, that art grown and become strong: for [t] thy greatness is grown, and reacheth unto heaven, and thy dominion to the end of the earth.

23 And whereas the king [u] saw a watcher and an holy One coming down from heaven, and saying, Hew the tree down, and destroy it; yet leave the stump of the roots thereof in the earth, even with a band of iron and brass, in the tender grass of the field; and let it be wet with the dew of heaven, [x] and let his portion be with the beasts of the field, till seven times pass over him;

24 This is the interpretation, O king, and this is [y] the decree of the most High, which is [z] come upon my lord the king;

25 That they shall [a] drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field, and they shall make thee to eat grass as oxen, and they shall wet thee with the dew of heaven, and seven times shall pass over thee; [b] till thou know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will.

26 And whereas they commanded [c] to leave the stump of the tree-roots; thy kingdom shall be sure unto thee, after that thou shalt have known that [d] the heavens do rule.

27 Wherefore, O king, [e] let my counsel be acceptable unto thee, and [f] break off thy sins by righteousness, and thine iniquities [g] by shewing mercy to the poor; [h] if it may be a * lengthening of thy tranquillity.

under perturbation of mind. This the king noticed, and bade him not be troubled at the dream, or its interpretation; intimating that he should not be offended at him, for declaring the heaviest tidings to him. Accordingly Daniel introduced the subject with a very courtly, yet doubtless sincere expression of his good will: had the matter rested with him, the dream and its interpretation would have concerned only his enemies; but the most high God had otherwise determined. 'He was troubled for the great 'judgment of God, which he saw ordained against the 'king: and so the prophets used, on the one part, to de'nounce God's judgments, for the zeal they bare to his 'glory; and on the other part, to have compassion upon 'man, and also to consider, that they should be subject 'to God's judgments, if they did not regard them with 'pity.'

One hour. The word hour, as measuring time, occurs first in the writings of this prophet. (iii. 15.)

V. 20—26. The application of the dream to Nebuchadnezzar was very obvious. He was the flourishing tree, which in various respects was emblematical of his power, fame, wealth, and prosperity. The hewing down also of this tree, with the circumstances attending it, showed his loss of these advantages, through that judgment of God that was coming upon him: for being smitten with a most extraordinary madness, and becoming for a time like a brute, he would be utterly incapable of all the functions of government; and being consequently set aside, others would assume the direction of public affairs: and no remedy being found for his malady, and he discovering in every thing the propensities of an animal, he would be driven from the dwellings of men, and left to associate with the beasts, feeding with them upon grass, and exposed without shelter or covering to the inclemencies of the weather. This would continue for seven times, or years; till at length he would be made to know, that the most High ruled in the kingdom of men, and gave it to whom he pleased. It is observable, that Daniel omitted the last expression used by the king; and setteth up over it the basest of men; thinking perhaps the application mortifying enough without repeating it. He also showed him, that the kingdom would be ensured to him, after he was convinced, that, however high any of the kings of the earth might be exalted, the heavens, or the God of heaven, alone ruled with independent and absolute authority. This dream and its interpretation would become known in the court of Nebuchadnezzar; and as Daniel was in great authority there, when the former part of it received so remarkable an accomplishment, he would use his influence to lead all parties concerned to expect the fulfilment of the latter part also: and thus God wonderfully inclined their hearts to wait for that event, managing the affairs of the empire by a regency, and not advancing any other person to the throne; that it might be open for Nebuchadnezzar's restoration, when he recovered the use of his rational powers.

V. 27. Daniel concluded by entreating the king to take in good part the counsel that he was about to give him; and in good earnest to repent and renounce his sins, and begin to lead a life of righteousness; to cease from all oppression and injustice, and show mercy to his poor subjects and captives, especially the poor worshippers of JEHOVAH: that so renouncing idolatry, he might become the servant of the most High God; for perhaps this might prove a lengthening of his tranquillity. Daniel could not be sure but that this judgment was conditionally denounced, (as the destruction of Nineveh by Jonah:) or it might at least be retarded, or alleviated. 'Wherefore, O king, 28 ¶ All this [f] came upon the king Nebuchadnezzar.

29 At the [k] end of twelve months, he walked * in the palace of the kingdom of Babylon.

30 The king spake and said, [l] Is not this [m] great Babylon, [n] that I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, [o] and for the honour of my majesty?

31 While [p] the word was in the king's mouth, there [q] fell a voice from heaven, saying, O king Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken; [r] The kingdom is departed from thee.

32 And [s] they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field: they shall make thee to eat grass as oxen, and seven times shall pass over thee, [t] until thou know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will.

33 The [u] same hour was the thing fulfilled upon Nebuchadnezzar: and he was driven from men, and did eat grass as oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hairs were grown like eagles' feathers, and his nails like bird's claws.

34 ¶ And [x] at the end of the days I Nebuchadnezzar [y] lifted up mine eyes unto heaven, and mine understanding returned unto me, and [z] I blessed [a] the most High, and I praised and honoured [b] him that liveth for ever, [c] whose dominion is an everlasting dominion, and his kingdom is from generation to generation:

"Let there be an healing of thy error." (Marg.) 'Suffer the errors of thy former life to be 'redressed.' The Septuagint renders the first clause, 'Redeem thy iniquities by alms-deeds:' but the translation no more accords to the original than the doctrine does to the constant tenour of Scripture.

V. 28—33. The Lord gave Nebuchadnezzar a year's respite and space for repentance: but he seems neither to have repented nor profited by Daniel's plain-dealing; and probably the impression wore off in a continual succession of business and pleasure. So that, after the expiration of the year, he was exceedingly elated in his mind by reflecting on his great success and achievements. He is generally supposed to have been walking in a terrace of those hanging gardens, that were annexed to his most magnificent palace: these were raised to a vast height in the air, with surprising art, labour, and expense; and from the uppermost he had a view at once of the whole city, and all its sumptuous edifices. With these objects before his eyes, he said, (probably in soliloquy,) "Is not this great Babylon, which "I have built, &c?" The city had indeed been founded many ages before: but he had vastly enlarged, beautified, enriched, replenished, and fortified it; so that it became the wonder of the world for its walls, temples, palaces, and decorations; and therefore he spake as if he had built it from the ground. The end he proposed in these works was, that it might be "the house of his kingdom," his royal city, the centre of his kingdom, and the seat of his government: this he supposed he had done by his own power; and he aimed in doing it to promote the honour of his majesty. Thus he took all the glory to himself, and overlooked entirely his obligations and accountableness to God, and his dependence on him: he regarded all as his own, to be used according to his own will, and for his own glory, without any respect to the will and glory of God. This was the language of a proud apostate rebel, of one who aspired to the throne of God and was his rival; according to the first temptation, "Ye shall be as gods;" and according to the character of the ambitious tempter, who aspires to be the god and prince of this world; (Marg. Ref.) But whilst this proud word was in the king's mouth, and probably known to none but God and himself; a voice came from heaven directed to him by name, and denouncing the immediate execution of the sentence predicted in the dream. These seem to have been the last words that he understood, before he was deprived of his reason; and they were attended with such terror, as might concur in bringing the judgment upon him: however, he well recollected them, when at length he recovered his senses. Immediately the sentence was carried into execution; and he continued brutalized, (so to speak,) till his hairs, (probably over his whole body,) were grown like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws. It is of no use to inquire particularly into the nature and causes of this strange malady, or to show that aught of the kind ever befel any other person. Nothing is too hard for the Lord: it was immediately from him, in execution of his righteous sentence, for the display of his own glory, and for other most merciful purposes, though it had the appearance of severity. The previous notice, given by the dream and its interpretation, would tend to dispose the persons concerned to concur with the divine appointment, and to leave him for the time to the life of a brute.

heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth: and [f] none can stay his hand, or say unto him, [g] What doest thou?

35 At the same time [h] my reason returned unto me; and for the glory of my kingdom [i] mine honour and brightness returned unto me; and my counsellors and my lords sought unto me; and I was established in my kingdom, and excellent majesty was [k] added unto me.

37 Now [l] I Nebuchadnezzar praise and extol and honour the King of heaven, [m] all whose works are truth, and his ways judgment: and [n] those that walk in pride he is able to abase.

V. 34—37. At the end of the predicted season, Nebuchadnezzar was suddenly restored to the perfect use of his reason. He lifted up his eyes to heaven, as a rational creature, and in adoration of the glorious majesty of God, who there reigned over all the kings of the earth; and, (instead of raging like a wild bull in a net, as so proud a man under so mortifying a dispensation would have been apt to do,) he blessed and praised the most high God; acknowledging the justice, wisdom, and mercy of his dealings with him; thanking him for sparing and recovering him; and giving him honour and worship, as the living and true God, the universal, almighty, and everlasting Sovereign; in comparison of whom all the inhabitants of the earth, even the mightiest monarchs and conquerors, are reputed as nothing; who doeth according to his own will both in the glorious armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth: and as none can withstand his power, or defeat his counsels; so none may find fault with any thing he doeth, or call him to account; seeing he hath an unalienable right to do what he will, and cannot deviate from the most perfect wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness. This acknowledgment was the first evidence that his reason was restored to him; and it showed that he was far more rational than he had ever been before; and more fit for ruling others, seeing he understood his subordination to God, as his Ruler and Lord. Accordingly he was reinstated in his honour and prosperity, that his kingdom might be rendered more glorious and renowned than ever: his counsellors and princes, (induced probably by Daniel,) perceiving the predicted change, sought to him, and replaced him on his throne; and he was more honoured and prospered than he had been before, as he probably ruled more in righteousness, and for the general good of his subjects. And now he declared to the whole world, that instead of seeking his own glory, or worshipping Belus, it was his business and constant practice to worship and honour the king of heaven; all whose works verify his holy word; all whose dealings with his creatures are in justice and wisdom, and who knows how to humble in repentance, or to abase in contempt and destruction, those who walk in pride, and have been most habituated to it or most odious in it. No better words could possibly have been spoken on the subject, nor can any comment reach their energy and full meaning: and though we cannot perhaps certainly conclude any man's conversion from his words, without we witness his works coincident with them: yet there can be no reasonable doubt, but he was a true penitent, a convert to God, and a believer. The simplicity and humility with which he recorded his own proud and vain-glorious language, and the diligence with which he circulated this mortifying narrative throughout his empire, concur with his excellent discourse of God and his works and his dealings with him, in establishing this conclusion. And the exceeding riches of God's mercy and grace in rendering such a proud tyrant, idolater, and oppressor, one of his children and servants, should not be veiled from our view. Nor does this instance materially differ from the case of other sinners, who have given evidence of their humiliation, repentance, faith, reconciliation to God, love to him, and zeal for his glory, even when connected with their own disgrace: for "where sin "hath abounded grace much more abounds." 'Nebu-'chadnezzar exposes himself to shame before the whole 'world, that he may glorify God. This is the true way 'of praising God.' It is computed that Nebuchadnezzar did not live above a year after this restoration: and though the imperfect histories which remain of those times, give no distinct account of these events; yet they mention that he prophesied of the conquest of Babylon by the Medes and Persians, and of other remote transactions. This must have arisen from the attention that he paid, towards the close of his life, to the prophecies of Daniel, and the assurance with which he declared his expectation of their accomplishment.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—9.

The dispassionate language of those who have most disturbed the earth by their ambition, implies that peace is the greatest of all blessings; and that they are the best friends to mankind, and the most honourable characters, who do most towards promoting and multiplying peace, temporal and spiritual, betwixt God and man, betwixt man and man, and in men's hearts and consciences.—When a sinner "comes to himself," whatever his previous character and conduct have been, he will deem it good to promote the welfare of mankind, by diffusing the knowledge of God, and of his glorious perfections and wonderful works; and if occasion require, he will be ready to declare the very things which most discover the sinfulness and folly of his own conduct, and the pride of his own heart. The more men get acquainted with God and his works, the higher their admiration will be of his greatness and glory; and the less they will think of their own attainments and exaltation: and we should all count it our privilege to propagate our discoveries on such interesting subjects according to our measure of ability, influence, or authority. When carnal men have accomplished their projects, and have arrived at the degree of prosperity and affluence to which they aspired; when they are at rest in their houses or palaces, and flourishing in their external circumstances; when they are saying to their souls, in

A hand, seen writing on the wall, and the inability of the astrologers to read what was written, greatly terrify them, 5—9. Daniel, by means of the queen, is brought in, 10—16. vain-confident security, "Soul take thine ease, eat, drink, "and be merry:" then there is reason to conclude, that some heavy calamity impends over them. If at any time terror seizes on ungodly men, they generally first seek direction, or relief, from sinful measures or worthless delusions: nor do any of us at all times apply to the Lord, or his servants, for counsel or comfort, till other counsellors and comforters disappoint our expectations. The more these are proved, the emptier they are found to be, and the plainer it appears, that they promise only to deceive. But it is happy, if at last we are willing humbly to hearken to those, who are taught by the Spirit of our holy God, to make known to us his truth and will. Yet many have general convictions, as well as repeated instructions, concerning the divine perfections, authority, and majesty; and concerning a discrimination of characters between the faithful ministers of Christ and deceivers of every kind; whose views remain strangely confused, whose hearts still cleave to their idols, superstitions, and lusts; and who only apply for information in their perplexity, without any disposition to yield an obedient ear to the commandments of God.

The utmost worldly prosperity and exaltation, is but as that of a tree growing out of the earth, to a great height, very conspicuous, covered with leaves and branches, and such fruit as may profit men in their temporal interests; and which must soon be cut down, destroyed, or cast into the fire: but the "trees of righteousness," which the Lord hath planted, when they cease to flourish and bear fruit on earth, shall be transplanted to heaven, and be fruitful and flourishing there for ever. Monarchs should use their power to protect and diffuse good among their subjects; but how feeble is their protection, and how trivial their good, compared with that of Christ our Prince and Saviour! The degree and continuance of human prosperity depend entirely on that glorious Lord, who "orders "all things according to the counsel of his own will," for the honour of his great name; often by the ministration of angels, and in answer to the prayers and for the good of his people. He mercifully corrects, when he might justly destroy: and the most severe and durable of all temporal calamities is unspeakable mercy to a sinner, if it conduce to the salvation of his soul. And though every kind and degree of insanity be justly dreaded, as the most terrible affliction to which we are here exposed: yet should the most entire madness, idiotism, or even degradation to the rank of the brutes, for years, preserve a sinner from multiplying crimes, and treasuring up wrath; there would be in it a degree of mercy, and it would evidently be preferable to an unrestrained course of prosperous vice: and if at last it should be over-ruled to his salvation, it would be the subject of eternal praises. Nay, if the Lord should see good by such means to keep a believer from dishonouring his name, by any folly or wickedness to which he was powerfully tempted; the dreadful prevention would be far preferable to the evil thus prevented. So that we know not what is best for us, all things considered. No honour, dignity, wealth, abilities, learning, or usefulness, can ensure a man from the most degrading situation, in which human nature hath yet been placed: and it would be easy for the Lord to reduce any person to the extremest indigence and misery, that ever were experienced in a hospital, a dungeon, or a mad-house; or even to drive him forth among the beasts of the field, to feed and herd with them, and grow like them. We should therefore be thankful for, and make a good use of, our reason and advantages, whilst we enjoy them; and we should diligently seek the assurance of those blessings, that can never be taken from us: we should especially beware of pride and forgetfulness of God, and study to be influenced by the conviction, that the most High ruleth over the whole world, and giveth it to whom he pleaseth: and we have no reason to covet or glory in those outward distinctions, which are often conferred on the basest of men, but we ought rather to seek those blessings, that are peculiar to the saints, who are the excellent of the earth.

V. 19—27.

It may well astonish and trouble a benevolent mind, to reflect on the miseries, which impend over ungodly men; and even over many of those, with whom we are most nearly connected, and to whom we are under the greatest obligations. We should, as opportunity offers, be faithful to the greatest of men; yet recollection and caution should precede our addresses, as they must give pain or offence: and they should be delivered with such expressions of goodwill, as may evince, that we are grieved to speak what we dare not conceal, and would gladly avert what we cannot but perceive to be coming upon them. They who are in superior stations should encourage the servants of God to deal plainly with them, as they will be much tempted to the contrary, which would be the loss of both parties.—A great part of the minister's faithfulness consists in applying general truths to particular persons or characters; that every sinner may discern himself to be intended, and not others only as his self-love may suggest. This should be so clearly stated, that men may see how the case and character described in the word of God agree with their own; and how the doom denounced belongs to them, except they repent: for the decree of the most high God will be executed upon kings, as well as upon their meanest subjects. It may be doubtful, whether temporal calamities can by any means be averted; but final misery will certainly be escaped by all who "repent and turn to God, "and do works meet for repentance." And if it be "the "Father's good pleasure to give us the kingdom," it will be made sure to us, as with a band of iron and brass; all our trials and losses will work together to prepare us for it, and put us in possession of it; and to bring us to that knowledge of God, that submission to his righteousness, teaching, and authority, and that humble love of his name and zeal for his glory, which constitute the meetness for that inheritance. It behooves those, who declare God's judgments against sinners, to call them to repentance; and to show them what they must cease from, and do; what they ought to renounce, and what to choose: for there can be no true faith or forgiveness, where men do not break off their sins by righteousness, and learn justice, equity, and mercy to the poor and afflicted. These things duly attended to may lengthen our temporal tranquillity; and if they spring from an upright heart, they will evidence our interest in heavenly blessings.

V. 28—37.

When the Lord gives time for repentance as well as warnings, and calls to repent, and men grow hardened in pride; when they persist and increase in self-sufficiency and self-idolatry; in contempt of God, and his authority, justice and mercy; and in sacrilegiously robbing him of his glory: the sentence that hath been long suspended over them, must be executed suddenly and without remedy.—The voice of his condemning word will silence all the proud speeches, which sinners are uttering to themselves, or to one another. Whatever dreadful misery, or place men fall into on earth, they will one way or other get out again: but they, who lift up their eyes in hell, will never be able to pass that gulph which separates betwixt them and the heirs of salvation. The Lord can increase, extend, limit, and terminate our troubles, as he pleases: and as he can deprive men of, or restore them to, the use of their understandings, and disqualify or again fit them for, every place and service; as he can renew, humble, and soften the heart, and bring the proudest enemy to become his most devoted supplicant and thankful worshipper and servant: so he can restrain the ambition of men, and lead those who know him not to fulfil his purposes; even where that requires such an exactness in their conduct, as seems only capable of being produced by the most conscientious, unreserved, and self-denying obedience. When sinners recover from that state of infatuation, to which they are reduced by Satan and their lusts, and through which they pore and grovel upon the earth, like the beasts that perish; they will first show it, by lifting up their eyes to heaven, adoring, and expecting help from God, and setting their affections on things above: and when believers are delivered from sanctified affliction, instead of repining at the Lord's dealings with them, they will, with their restored health and faculties, bless the most high God for his gracious chastisement, as well as for the removal of it; and endeavour to honour him who liveth and reigneth for evermore. In proportion to our near and distinct views of his holy and righteous sovereignty and almighty power, the meaner will all the inhabitants of the earth appear in our estimation; for they are reputed as nothing before him. As "he doeth what "he will in heaven and on earth, and none can stay "his hand," or call him to account for his conduct; we should learn to receive every thing as his appointment, to submit to his will, to seek his favour, and to rejoice that his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure. Thus our trials and deliverances will prove mercies; and we shall use every gift of God to promote the glory of the giver. This is our highest privilege, and the sure path to immortal happiness; wherein "excellent majesty will be "added to us." In every circumstance of life and death, we should bless, praise, and honour our God and Saviour, and excite others to do the same; for "all his works are "done in truth, and his ways are judgment:" he knoweth how to abase those who walk in pride, but he giveth grace and consolation to the humble and broken-hearted sinner, that calls upon him.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—4. Belshazzar signifies Bel is his riches: he was the grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, and not his immediate successor, (Note, Ezra i. 1—4.) (Marg. Ref.) He reigned seventeen years; and was all that while engaged in unsuccessful war with Cyrus and the Medes and Persians, having succeeded to it along with his kingdom. Cyrus had driven the Chaldean armies out of the field, and at this time besieged Babylon: but the king and people, confiding in their impregnable fortifications, the abundance of provisions stored up in the city, and the extent of cultivated lands within the walls, derided his attempts. Indeed it seemed scarcely possible that he should succeed: but he was raised up by God for that service, and was endued with extraordinary capacity, vigour, and perseverance; whilst Belshazzar was a feeble and negligent prince, given up to pleasure, and leaving the affairs of his kingdom to others. Cyrus had already formed his plan, and had privately made preparation for draining off the waters of the Euphrates into adjacent lakes and reservoirs; that he might march his army on its channel into the city: and he waited for this feast, as the proper time for the execution of his design. It was a stated festival, probably observed in honour of some idol, on which it was customary for the people of all ranks to give a full loose to their appetites, in every kind of indulgence: and Cyrus reasonably expected on that occasion to find them off their guard and in the utmost confusion; nor was he disappointed. For, regardless of so potent and vigilant an enemy at the gates, Belshazzar set his subjects the example of riot and excess, and they copied it. He entertained a thousand of his nobles at his own table, and it was considered as a great condescension that he would eat and drink with them; for these princes did not generally mix with their subjects. Whilst they were thus regaling themselves with generous wines, he purposed to fetch the sacred vessels of the temple to drink out of, in contempt of JEHOVAH and his worshippers. The seventy predicted years of the captivity, from Jehoiakim's first reduction, drew near to an end; and Belshazzar might intend this to show his disregard of the prophecies respecting the restoration of the Jews. The vessels seem hitherto to have remained unmolested in the treasury of the temple of Belus: some indeed think, that they had been dedicated to that idol, and used in his worship; but this does not appear from the history. Belshazzar, however, at this time determined to appropriate them to his own use, and to pollute them by idolatry and intemperance. For whilst the company drank out of these sacred vessels, they celebrated the praises of their images, which were mere lifeless gold, or silver, &c.; probably singing songs of their pretended exploits, and to their honour; pouring out libations to them; and ascribing all the victories of their ancestors and the greatness of their city, to their assistance; especially praising them as the authors of their success against the worshippers of JEHOVAH. Thus they seemed ambitious of carrying impiety and blasphemy to the greatest extreme. Many expositors seem to consider sacrilege as almost exclusively Belshazzar's crime. But the spoiling of the sacred treasures by Nebuchadnezzar, and no doubt appropriating them to his own use, was sacrilege in the same sense, as Belshazzar's employing the sacred vessels to common purposes: and the peculiar heinousness of Belshazzar's sin, seems to have consisted, in studiously and publicly insulting the God of Israel, by using the sacred vessels of his temple, when feasting in honour of the idols of Babylon.

V. 5—9. Whilst the king, his nobles, and women, were rejoicing with impious mirth, in defiance of the power, providence, and word of God; there appeared on the wall of the room, the fingers of a man's hand, employed in writing, over against the candlestick, that it might be more distinctly seen. This no doubt was effected by the ministration of an angel: as the king first saw the hand, so the writing afterwards remained on the wall; and though he did not understand what was written, yet conscious guilt led him to forebode some dreadful meaning. His thoughts troubled him; his remorse of conscience caused him to turn pale; his whole frame was disordered, so that the joints of his loins were loosed through terror, and his knees smote against each other; (Notes, Is. xxi. 2—5. xlv. 1—3. Marg. Ref.) in great anguish and agitation therefore, he called to his servants to bring in the astrologers, &c: and with large promises of honour and preferment, he allured them to exert their utmost skill to read and interpret the hand writing. But they were not able to do it; and some not very probable conjectures have been formed concerning the reason of their inability: but we only know, that God was pleased, for the honour of his own name, to hide it from them. This renewed, or increased, Belshazzar's consternation; and his nobles also, notwithstanding their numbers, mirth, and wine, were dismayed and astonished exceedingly. 'It was probably 'written in the old Hebrew letters, now called the Samaritan, which the Chaldeans were ignorant of.' (Lowth.) —It is, however, hardly conceivable, that no learned man in Babylon should be acquainted with the old Hebrew alphabet. But perhaps the difficulty lay, not in knowing the characters, but in finding out any consistent meaning in them. (Note, 25—28.)

V. 10—12. The queen, here spoken of, was not the queen-consort, as Belshazzar's wives and concubines were present at the feast; but the queen-mother, Nitocris, the widow of Evil-merodach, the son of Nebuchadnezzar and the father of Belshazzar, is generally supposed to be meant. She was a woman of great capacity and reputation; and her active and prudent management had been for some time the chief stay of the empire. She had not attended this riotous banquet: but hearing the tidings of the hand-writing, she came into the room: and, after the customary salutation, exhorted the king to resume his courage, and not to yield to terror or despondency; for though the wise men of Babylon could not read the writing, he had a man in his kingdom who could. She spoke of Daniel in language similar to what Nebuchadnezzar had used, and which she probably had learned from him; for she was aged, and Nebuchadnezzar had not been dead above twenty-four years, so that she no doubt well remembered the extraordinary events which occurred towards the close of his life. Having mentioned, that "in him was the Spirit of the "holy Gods," she spake with admiration of the variety of knowledge and wisdom that he possessed, like those of the gods, (according to her confused ideas on that subject:) she mentioned his being advanced above all the other wise men of Babylon; as having been repeatedly proved superior to them in excellency of knowledge and disposition, and in interpreting dreams, or solving difficult questions; alluding no doubt to the instances that have been considered. (ii. iv. And she observed that if he were called, he would certainly read and interpret the hand-writing. Probably, she knew where to find him, though Belshazzar did not; and might tacitly intend to censure his neglect of so extraordinary a person. Though Nebuchadnezzar called Daniel Belteshazzar, from the name of his idol, he was it seems generally known by his original name. He was not among the magicians, &c. when called by Belshazzar: and both these circumstances show, that he was well known as a zealous worshipper of Israel's God, and as entirely estranged from the practices of the magicians; though erroneously considered by Nitocris as the master of them. (Note, iv. 8, 9.)

V. 13—16. Some infer from Belshazzar's ignorance of Daniel, that he had not been employed by him; but this rather proves that the king minded pleasure more than business; and was better acquainted with those who ministered to his sensuality, than with such as managed affairs of state. It is certain that Daniel did "the king's busi-"ness" in the former years of Belshazzar, (viii. 27,) and it seems probable, that he was never quite laid aside, though comparatively neglected. Indeed Belshazzar spoke to him with less respect, than Nebuchadnezzar had been used to do; and seems even to have reflected on him as a stranger and a captive, whilst he acknowledged his extraordinary endowments. As, however, the wise men could not read the writing, and he had been informed that Daniel could, he was willing that he should on that condition have the promised recompense.

V. 17. Daniel evidently behaved in a very different manner to Belshazzar, on this occasion, from what he had formerly done to Nebuchadnezzar; both omitting the customary expressions of respect and good-will, and slighting his offers of honour and preferment. But it should be considered, that Nebuchadnezzar was his senior, as well as his superior in authority, and his benefactor: whereas he spoke to Belshazzar as a very aged and eminent person, (being at this time almost ninety years old,) to one much 18 O thou king, [i] the most high God gave Nebuchadnezzar thy father a kingdom, and majesty, and glory, and honour.

19 And for the majesty that he gave him, [k] all people, nations, and languages, trembled and feared before him: [l] whom he would he slew, and whom he would he kept alive, and whom he would he set up, and whom he would he put down.

20 But [m] when his heart was lifted up, and his mind hardened * in pride, he was † deposed from his kingly throne, and they took his glory from him:

21 And [n] he was driven from the sons of men; and ‡ his heart was made like the beasts, and his dwelling was with the wild asses: they fed him with grass like oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven; [o] till he knew that the most high God ruled in the kingdom of men, and that he appointeth over it whomsoever he will.

younger than himself. He had in former instances known from prophecy, that the Chaldean monarchy would continue for some time, and his preferment gave him an opportunity of being useful: but he was now assured that Belshazzar's reign and life, and the Chaldean monarchy, were about to terminate together. Probably he was at this time nearly, if not fully, as high in authority as Belshazzar proffered to advance him; and he could scarcely avoid despising one that was so extremely ignorant concerning the affairs of his own kingdom. Nebuchadnezzar was a very faulty character: yet he had abilities, applied them to business, and was in many respects eminent, as a monarch: but Belshazzar was every way base, odious, and contemptible. Above all, he had that night been insulting the God of heaven in the most daring manner, by profaning the sacred vessels in his revels, and extolling his own idols. Daniel therefore knew that his doom was irreversible, and immediately to be put in execution: and he did not speak to him, as a subject to his prince; but as the delegate of heaven he denounced sentence against him, as a condemned criminal.

V. 18—24. Daniel called the king's attention to the singular example of Nebuchadnezzar, (whom he calls his father, as grandfathers, and even more remote ancestors, are often called in Scripture, (Marg. Ref.) and thus solemnly introduced his interpretation. Nebuchadnezzar had received all his power from God; he had become terrible to all the nations of his vast empire; and he had used his unlimited authority, not always with equity and clemency, but often in an arbitrary and unjust manner. Yet the immediate cause of that well-known judgment, to which he was exposed, was the hardness of his heart, through pride and presumption, in arrogant contempt and defiance of God: for which diabolical sin he was degraded as it were to a brute, till he was brought to submit and worship the Lord; which at length he did in language almost angelical. (Notes, iv.) But though Belshazzar had been fully informed of all these facts, yet he had not humbled himself before God: but had been guilty of an insult on him, more flagrant than any of Nebuchadnezzar's crimes; having sacrilegiously used the consecrated vessels in honour of his base idols, and thus refused to glorify the God, "in whose hand his breath was, and whose were "all his ways." (Marg. Ref.) And it was at the very time, when he was thus setting JEHOVAH at defiance, that the hand-writing was seen on the wall.

V. 25—28. The literal meaning of the words written seems to be: "He hath numbered, He hath numbered; "He hath weighed, and they divide it." This Daniel interpreted to signify, that God had certainly numbered the years or days of the Chaldean monarchy, and of Belshazzar's life, and they were now fully accomplished: the measure of his days was finished, and that of his iniquity was filled; so that God would no more spare him. Tekel, He hath weighed: this signified that the king was weighed in the impartial balances of divine justice, and found deserving of the deepest condemnation: as base metal and counterfeit money are detected by the scales, being weighed and found deficient.—Peres is the same as Upharsin, without the prefix and the termination, and signifies "they divide it:" but the similarity between Peres, and the original word for Persians, seems also referred to: and it was therefore interpreted to mean, that his kingdom was taken from him and given to the Medes, 29 Then commanded Belshazzar, and [f] they clothed Daniel with scarlet, and put a chain of gold about his neck, and made a proclamation concerning him, that he should be the third ruler in the kingdom.

30 ¶ In [g] that night was Belshazzar the king of the Chaldeans slain.

31 And [h] Darius the Median took the kingdom, * being † about threescore and two years old.

and Persians, who would possess it between them. It is remarkable, that Daniel never exhorted Belshazzar to repentance, for he knew that his doom was fixed, (Note, 1 Sam. xxviii. 12—19.)

V. 29. Belshazzar seems not to have understood that the sentence was to be executed immediately: but whether he believed Daniel or not, he made a point of showing no resentment, and of ordering him the promised recompense: and though Daniel had previously expressed his contempt of the honours intended him, yet he did not refuse them; though he foresaw the immediate termination of that authority by which they were conferred. Some, however, suppose, that the orders were indeed given immediately; but the execution of them was necessarily deferred till morning, which the intervening transactions of course prevented.

V. 30, 31. Whilst these things were transacting in the palace, two divisions of Cyrus's army had marched on the channel of the river into the city, from each end of it: and finding the gates of brass, intended to bar the entrance from the river into the streets, left open, through the carelessness and intoxication of the beseiged, they met, and marched into the heart of the city without opposition, and surprised the palace before the alarm was given. So that, having broken in and slain Belshazzar, and proclaimed peace and safety to all who laid down their arms, a general submission followed, and the city was taken, and the empire reduced, almost without further blood-shed. (Marg. Ref.) Cyrus was son-in-law and nephew to Darius, or Cyaxares, the Mede; to whom the title of king and the civil authority belonged till his death, which happened about two years after: but Cyrus still retained the command of the army, and great power over the whole empire. It is computed, that Darius was born that very year in which Jeconiah was carried captive to Babylon, and a fatal blow given to the kingdom of Judah.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—9.

Carnal men are often most secure, and given up to excessive indulgence, when destruction impends over their heads. Ostentation and studied magnificence unite with sensuality in stupifying their consciences and hardening their hearts: and if we could see how soon such joyous and luxurious revels are exchanged for "weeping, wail-"ing, and gnashing of teeth;" we must view those who frequent them with a mixture of pity and aversion; as we should a company of condemned malefactors, whom we saw intoxicated, and dancing in their chains, immediately before the hour appointed for their execution. Such drunken carousals were very consistent in the worshippers of lifeless images and of unclean spirits: for it might have been expected, that these objects and ordinances of religious worship would lead men to impious and blasphemous defiance of the God of heaven; as well as into every excess in sensual gratification. But what have Christians to do with such revellings, banquetings, and abominable idolatries? And what better are the songs used in many modern feasts, extolling intemperate indulgencies and licentious amours, than the praises formerly sung to Bacchus, and Venus, or any other of the filthy group of Pagan Deities? Or what are these things but a direct insult on that triune God, in whose name we have been baptized? Yet many "think it strange, that we will not run with "them to the same excess of riot, speaking evil of us!" Nay, some seem to imagine that no pleasures have their highest relish, unless seasoned with impiety or sacrilege; and they not only sin for the gratification of their sensual passions, but for the sake of sinning; as if their oaths, blasphemies, and profaneness, were pleasant to them, in proportion as they are provoking to God! and the more join together in such outrages, the bolder they grow in them. But how easily can the Lord dismay such daring enemies! He has no need to commission thunders, lightnings, or earthquakes: he can do it effectually by a handwriting on a wall, or by showing them what he hath written in his word. One glimpse of his glorious and holy majesty, one realizing apprehension of "his wrath "revealed against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of "men," is sufficient to appal the heart, to change the countenance, and to agitate the whole frame, of the stoutest rebel on earth. But no bodily pain or anguish can give an adequate conception of that inward agony, which sometimes seizes the sinner, in the midst of mirth and jovial company, when enjoying all the delights of sense, with all the magnificence of a palace, or the exhilarations of a banqueting-house. For if God is pleased merely to let a man's conscience loose upon him, his own thoughts will so trouble him, that his feelings will be an anticipation of the sorrows of death and of the pains of hell. How important then is it, that we, above all things, seek to be at peace with him, and with our own consciences! Sometimes indeed such terrors are salutary, and cause a man to cry out, "What must I do to be saved?" and so lead him to Christ for pardon and peace. But many cry out, through horror of conscience and fear of wrath, who are not humbled for their sins, and who seek relief from anguish by lying vanities. These will liberally reward such as can help them to forget their misery, or amuse them with vain hopes, or gratify their curiosity, pride, or sensuality.—But when the Lord lays his hand on men, these expedients do not afford so much as a temporary relief: and he often blinds and infatuates the wise men of this world, that he may bring into notice those whom he hath endued with heavenly wisdom; nor can all human sagacity develope the plainest matter that he is pleased to conceal. Yet the ignorance and uncertainty, which professedly wise men manifest concerning the meaning of sacred Scripture, tends to drive awakened sinners to despair.

CHAP. VI.

Daniel is highly preferred by Darius, and envied by his courtiers, who can find no occasion against him except concerning his religion, 1—5. Darius is prevailed on to sign a decree prohibiting every one, during thirty days, to present any petition to either God or man except the king, under pain of being cast into the den of lions, 6—9. Daniel prays three times a day to the Lord as usual; is accused before Darius; the execution of the sentence is urgently demanded, and Daniel is cast into the den of lions, 10—17. The king shows much grief: but Daniel is miraculously preserved; his accusers are devoured by the lions, 18—24. Darius commands all his subjects to fear before the almighty God, whom Daniel served, 25—27. Daniel's subsequent prosperity, 28.

2 And over these, three presidents, [c] of whom Daniel was first: [d] that the princes might give accounts unto them, and the king should have no damage. [c] ii. 48, 49. v. 16. 29. 1 Sam. ii. 30 Prov. iii. 16. [d] Matt. xviii. 23. Luke xvi. 2.

V. 10—17.

In this evil world the most excellent and useful persons are often left in obscurity, like diamonds in the rubbish of the quarry, because their value is not perceived: yet, if the Lord have work for them, he will, by one means or other, bring them forth to do it. The encouragement given, by persons in other respects of great abilities, to ungodly sinners, not to let their thoughts trouble them, often goes upon as erroneous principles as those on which the queen comforted Belshazzar. Alas! what did it avail him, that Daniel could read the writing, when it contained his irrevocable condemnation? And what else can the holy law do for transgressors, when men are taught to seek righteousness and salvation by their own obedience? Many have heard of, and been led to admire and applaud, the light understanding, and wisdom of some eminent servant of God; to ascribe his attainments to a divine influence, and to consider him as of a more excellent spirit than other men; who yet wish to consult him, only as a superior kind of magician, to interpret their dreams, to solve curious questions, and to explain difficult and controverted subjects, without inquiring after the way of salvation, or the path of duty! But if any one hath, even by such means, access to the great and powerful, when under tribulations or convictions, at whatever distance he may be kept, or however they may soothe him by promises or flatteries, he must remember his own character and work, and not be content with gratifying the humour of princes or nobles, or his own love of lucre or honour. In some cases it is right to reject their proffered kindness with decision, or even disdain; at all times to show an indifference about such matters, and be far more earnest to do them good, and declare the whole counsel of God.

V. 18—31.

When sinners have long neglected to profit by the judgments of God on others, their own aggravated destruction may be supposed to approach. Their ancestors, or neighbours, have prospered and forgotten their Maker; they have been intoxicated with exaltation, and have abused it in tyranny and oppression; they have become terrible in proportion as they have been powerful; and they have been hardened in proud contempt of God, instead of being rendered thankful to him. Perhaps he hath made examples of them in the view of others, by some signal judgments, till they have learned to submit and to adore: yet the persons who have known all this, have in similar circumstances imitated and exceeded their pride, tyranny, and impieties; regardless of that God "in whom they live, "and move, and are!" Thus men fill up the measure of their iniquity, and bring upon themselves "the judgment "that is written." Whatever be their rank or situation, persons of this description cannot reasonably expect to hear any thing, except severe rebukes and awful denunciations, from the servants of God. Soon will every impenitent sinner find the hand-writing of God's word, that now stands out against him, executed upon him; whether he be weighed in the balance of the law, as a self-righteous Pharisee, or in that of the Gospel, as a painted hypocrite. His days will soon be numbered and finished; he will be judged and condemned, and all that he seems to have will be taken from him, and divided among his enemies, or successors; whilst nothing will remain for himself but indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, for evermore. Ere the uncertain term of life then be finished, let us judge ourselves according to the word of God; let us weigh our characters in his impartial balances: that though the law condemn us as sinners, yet we may not be adjudged unbelievers by the Gospel, but may find an interest in those blessings, which will be perfected in a kingdom that cannot be moved, or taken from us. Having these good things, we may despise the honour that cometh from man; and we shall rejoice and be exalted, whilst sudden and inevitable destruction overtake all the workers of iniquity.

translated "that the king should have no damage," may be rendered, "that the king should not be troubled."

V. 3. We may suppose that Daniel's interpretation of the hand-writing, just before the taking of Babylon, made him known to Darius. His renown, however, for wisdom and integrity was very great, and he was found upon trial to deserve all the reputation which he had acquired: so that Darius, when he made a new arrangement of his dominions, upon this vast accession of territory, under three presidents, thought good to make Daniel the chief of them, and as it were the viceroy of the whole empire.

V. 4, 5. The great reputation and preferment of a stranger, who had also been a minister of state for many years under the kings of Babylon, could not but give umbrage to Darius's own subjects. The nobles of his court, especially the princes and presidents, would envy his prosperity, disdain subjection to him, and covet his high station, as well as hate him for his religion: and probably his circumspection, integrity, experience, and penetration, would preclude many of the courtiers from those fraudulent advantages, which they had expected, and would tend to expose their iniquitous practices. Thus various passions would concur in producing a combination against him. But such was his unexceptionable conduct, such his unbiassed impartiality, his strict integrity, and consummate prudence, that they could find no handle against him, or discover so much as a fault, or mistake, of which to accuse him before the king. And they were constrained to confess to each other, in their secret cabals, that they should never be able to substantiate an accusation against him, except they could render his religion criminal: and in this they knew him to be very exact, and one who would not deviate from his plan for any interest, or to avoid any danger.

V. 6—9. We can scarcely imagine a more absurd decree, than this proposed to Darius, to be by him rendered irreversible. And at first sight, it seems almost inconceivable that any man could be induced, by influence and persuasion, and without the shadow of an argument, to pass such an edict. But power and prosperity are intoxicating; this decree seemed to make the king, for a month, the sole deity and benefactor in his empire; and thus it addressed itself to his pride and vainglory. His nobles would doubtless pretend, that it was thought a proper honour to be conferred on so illustrious a prince, and that it would conduce to the public tranquillity. At the instance therefore of so many chief men, perhaps deeming it a sort of a compliment; and having but faint impressions of a Supreme Being, to whom all have constant need to present their petitions, he heedlessly signed the decree, without suspecting the malice concealed under it. They pretended, that all the presidents were consulted, and concurred in proposing this matter to him: but Daniel the chief of them knew nothing of it; and so all signified no more than two of them! Probably the rest of the persons mentioned had yielded assent to it, some heedlessly, others maliciously. Thus, not only was all the exercise of every kind of religion suspended by law, through this vast empire, for the space of a month; (except any chose to worship the king, who thus inconsiderately, or impiously, suffered himself to be regarded as the only deity of his subjects:) but no request might be made by one man to another: nay, the edict was so framed, that a child might have been condemned by it for asking bread of his father, or a starving beggar for craving relief. But they who framed the law had one object in view, and did not mean to make any further use of it. 'We have consulted, which way we may do thee 'the most honour, and most ingratiate thee with thy sub-'jects, now at thy first entrance on thy throne; and we 'have found no way more plausible than this; we have 'decreed, that none of thy subjects shall for the space of 'thirty days, make any petition, to any god or man, save 'to thee, O king: that by this means they may be-'inured to an awful and divine conceit of thy greatness, 'and be more encouraged to have access to thee, for the 'more endearing of thee to them by the granting of their 'suits.' (Bp. Hall.)

Law of, &c. 'Here the words are, "The law of the "Medes and Persians," 'out of regard to the king who 'was a Mede; there,' (Esth. i. 19.) 'it is styled "the "law of the Persians and Medes," the king being a 10 ¶ Now when Daniel knew that the writing was signed, he went into his house; and [r] his windows being open in his chamber toward Jerusalem, [s] he kneeled upon his knees [t] three times a day, and prayed, and [u] gave thanks before his God, [x] as he did aforetime.

11 Then these men [y] assembled, and found Daniel praying, and making supplication before his God.

12 Then [z] they came near, and spake before the king concerning the king's decree; Hast thou not signed a decree, that every man that shall ask a petition of any God or man within thirty days, save of thee, O king, shall be cast into the den of lions? The king answered and said, [a] The thing is true, according to the law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not.

13 Then answered they and said before the king, [b] That Daniel, which is of the children of the captivity of Judah, [c] regardeth not thee, O king, nor the decree that thou hast signed, but maketh his petition three times a day.

14 Then the king, when he heard these words, [d] was sore displeased with himself, and set his heart on Daniel to deliver him; and he laboured till the going down of the sun to deliver him.

15 Then these men assembled unto the king, and said unto the king, [e] Know, O king, that the law of the Medes and Persians is, That no decree nor statute which the king establisheth may be changed.

16 Then [f] the king commanded, and they brought Daniel, and cast him into the den of lions. [g] Now the king spake and said unto Daniel, Thy God whom thou servest continually, he will deliver thee.

17 And [h] a stone was brought, and laid upon the mouth of the den; and the king sealed it with his own signet, and with the signet of his lords: that the purpose might not be changed concerning Daniel.

"Persian at that time." (Lowth.) (Notes, Esth. ii. 1. viii. 8.)

V. 10, 11. Daniel was either absent from court when this business was transacted, or it was studiously concealed from him; for he seems not to have heard of it, till it was signed by the king and made public. But when he knew what had been done, he did not complain to Darius of hard usage, or exclaim against the absurdity, impiety, and iniquity of the edict; or make interest to have it repealed, or get a dispensation in his favour. He knew that he was aimed at, and his people through him: and therefore, as a public and eminent person, he determined to set a decided example of his religion, without fearing what man could do to him. He thought himself called on to protest against the law in this manner, either disregarding his life in so good a cause, or expecting a miraculous deliverance. He therefore continued his stated devotions in his chamber, morning, noon, and evening, with his windows open, and probably his door also; for his accusers entered without interruption, and found him presenting his supplications to his God. Though the city and temple were desolated, yet he prayed towards Jerusalem, as it was customary, with reference to the temple that had been a type of Christ; though he was very old, yet he prayed upon his knees. Whatever he had done at other times, or whatever other Jews might do in this emergency, he would by no means conceal his religion; and though he was a man of much business, it appears that he had three stated seasons of devotion every day. It is generally supposed, that in this he had reference to the hours of prayer, which were commonly observed by the Jews. 'He would not by silence 'show that he consented to this wicked decree. He set 'open his windows towards Jerusalem when he prayed; 'both to stir up himself with the remembrance of God's 'promises to his people, when they should pray toward 'that temple; and also that others might see, that he would 'neither consent in heart nor deed, for these few days, to 'any thing that was contrary to God's glory.'

V. 12—17. When Daniel's enemies had obtained the decree against him, and undeniable evidence of his disobedience to it, they seem still to have doubted of success: being aware how much the king valued so able and upright a servant, and how evidently he would perceive their malice in this machination against him. They therefore first reminded him that he had passed such a decree; seeking to draw from him an acknowledgment, that it was irreversible by the law of the Medes and Persians. Having succeeded in this, they copied the example of those who accused Shadrach, &c. before Nebuchadnezzar: and instead of mentioning Daniel as a man of great dignity, wisdom, and excellency; they described him contemptuously, as that Daniel, the captive Jew, who had been favoured and preferred; they accused him of disregarding the king and his decree, as if his worship of God had resulted from pride, ingratitude, and rebellion against Darius; and they reported that he made his petition three times a day, so that his offences were multiplied; but they did not mention the Object of his worship, perhaps lest that should suggest a vindication of his conduct. The king, however, at once perceived for what purpose the decree had been solicited: and was exceedingly displeased with himself, that he had suffered himself to be so deluded; as, under pretence of honouring him above all that was called god, or worshipped, they had devised to render him accessory to the murder of the most eminent and excellent person in his dominions. Under this conviction, he was very earnest to 18 ¶ Then the king went to his palace, and passed the night fasting: neither were * instruments of music brought before him: [k] and his sleep went from him.

19 Then the king [l] arose very early in the morning, and went in haste unto the den of lions.

20 And when he came to the den, he cried with a lamentable voice unto Daniel: and the king spake and said to Daniel, O Daniel, servant of the living God, [m] is thy God, whom thou [n] serve-t continually, [o] able to deliver thee from the lions?

21 Then said Daniel unto the king, [p] O king, live for ever.

22 [q] My God hath sent his angel, [r] and hath shut the lions' mouths, that they have not hurt me; [s] forasmuch as before him innocency was found in me; [t] and also before thee, O king, have I done no hurt.

23 Then [u] was the king exceeding glad for him, and commanded that they should take Daniel up out of the den. So Daniel was taken up out of the den, and no manner of hurt was found upon him, [x] because he believed in his God.

24 And the king commanded, [y] and they brought those men which had accused Daniel, and they cast them into the den of lions, them, [z] their children, and their wives: and [a] the lions had the mastery of them, and brake all their bones in pieces, or ever they came at the bottom of the den.

deliver Daniel; and he spent the day in considering how it might be done, and in trying to effect it; either by evading or dispensing with the edict, or in persuading his nobles not to insist on the execution of it. But the foolish constitution of this government, (exactly the reverse of the happy rule for our monarch's conduct!) allowed indeed their kings to be as tyrannical and mischievous as they pleased; but tied them up from pardoning any person, who had broken one of their decrees, however capricious and arbitrary! They might be cruel and unjust; but in many cases they might not be merciful, and in some they were restrained from doing justice! Thus the ringleaders of this faction turbulently assembled before Darius, and as it were demanded the execution of this most iniquitous sentence, as their constitutional right; so that Daniel was at length given up to their implacable rage. In this Darius was greatly to blame; for he should have refused his consent to so palpable an act of injustice, whatever had been the consequence. He however entertained some expectations, that Daniel's God, whom he had worshipped so long and devotedly, would rescue him in this emergency; having probably heard of the preservation of the three pious Jews in the fiery furnace. Thus he allowed, that Daniel had done right, and had pleased God, in violating his decree, and in that very action, for which he consented to cast him into the den of lions: as Pilate afterwards justified Christ, when he delivered him to be crucified.—Daniel was therefore thrown into the den of lions; and it might have been expected that they would have devoured him at once. Yet either it was seen, that the lions did not seize on him; or some expectation of a miraculous interposition, induced them to close the den with a stone, sealed with the king's own signet and that of his lords; that there might be full security against all collusion, and that he might be confined all night among the lions. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18—23. No doubt Daniel spent a far more pleasant night among the lions, whilst employed in fervent prayer and admiring grateful praise, than either the king, or his malicious prosecutors. As for the former, he was so grieved, and ashamed of his folly, so affected with the consideration of having cast his faithful servant into the den of lions, and so anxious about the event, that he spent the night fasting, and without any of his ordinary recreations, nor could he close his eyes to sleep. And as soon as the morning allowed him, he repaired to the den, having yet some hope that Daniel had been miraculously preserved. The decree having been now complied with, we may suppose that he ordered the stone to be removed; and then, through fear and consciousness of misconduct, he dolefully ventured to speak to Daniel, as if yet alive; inquiring whether the living God, whom he served continually, had shown himself able to deliver him. Some indeed think that he saw Daniel before he spake, but the contrary seems more probable: and his expectation of a miracle shows, that he had strong convictions of the power of Israel's God, though worldly motives retained him among the worshippers of idols. To this inquiry, Daniel, being safe and easy both in body and mind, answered with the utmost composure, without any complaint of unkindness, but with a respectful expression of his good will. Not only was the God of Israel able to protect him from the lions; but even a single angel, when commissioned by him, had power effectually to shut all their mouths. In this manner God had seen good to attest his innocency, in that matter for which he had been condemned: seeing, that he had approved himself upright before his heart-searching Judge; and he could appeal to the king also, that he had done him no wrong; having been actuated by a sense of duty, and not by any contempt of him or his laws. This answer was very welcome to Darius, who now ordered Daniel to be taken up out of the den: and he was found entirely unhurt; because he had believed in his God, and trusted in his protection whilst he obeyed his commandments.

V. 24. The law of the Medes and Persians forbade the king to pardon Daniel; but it did not restrain him from casting his accusers into the lion's den in his stead: nay, perhaps malicious prosecutors and false accusers were legally exposed to the same sentence that they sought to bring upon the innocent; for this has been a salutary provision in many nations. The ringleaders, however, of the conspiracy were cast into the den: for we cannot suppose that all the great men before mentioned were thus condemned, nor indeed could the lions have devoured so great a number at one time; and if he had thus punished the criminals alone, and had not cast in their wives and children with them, the sentence had been unexceptionable: but this was both unjust and cruel. Yet by this means the reality and greatness of the miracle wrought in Daniel's deliverance were evidenced: for the lions soon mastered and destroyed all that were cast into the den; by which it appeared, that they were exceedingly fierce and ravenous, and only restrained by a supernatural power; which being removed, they became through hunger the more voracious.

V. 25—28. After this, Darius, perhaps by Daniel's counsel, and in imitation of Nebuchadnezzar's example, published an account of these facts to all his subjects, in their several languages; and decreed, that they should all fear and tremble before the God of Daniel. He spake, in this address, very honourably of the Lord, as the living God; of the immutable steadfastness of his purposes, laws, and authority; and of his power to work miracles, and to deliver his servants; and he required his people to do him honour. But we do not find that he renounced idolatry, to become his worshipper; and his language is not comparable to that of Nebuchadnezzar's after his restoration to his reason and his throne: especially it wants that savour of humiliation and self-abasement which appears in the other. These events, thus authoritatively made known through so many nations, must have exceedingly tended to prepare the way for the diffusion of further light, by the Jews who went to sojourn in different countries, and at length by the preaching of the Gospel. After this Daniel continued in authority and prosperity under Darius, and his successor Cyrus, who reigned seven years. Daniel was living in the third year of Cyrus; but probably he died not long after. (x. 1.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

Piety, wisdom, and integrity, will be profitable to a man, in all possible circumstances: and they will often induce others to favour such as possess them, merely from regard to their own interests. In large kingdoms numbers must be employed in managing public affairs: but, alas, how seldom are many of them decidedly of an excellent spirit! And how seldom do kings prefer men entirely on that account! Yet nothing else can fully prevent damage to both prince and people. In some cases men may continue in favour and power, notwithstanding repeated and entire revolutions; not by a criminal fickleness, but through an immoveable adherence to integrity and prudence, and a readiness by every lawful means to do good to mankind.—Extraordinary honour, wisdom, or exaltation, always excites envy and enmity; but especially where one man's inflexible honesty disappoints or detects the iniquity and avarice of numbers. They, that are thus exposed to the view, malice, and severe scrutiny of multitudes, who are their competitors and enemies, have need to act with great circumspection and wisdom; that no fault or error, no evil, or appearance of evil, may be found in them: and it is very honourable to God and religion, when the most enraged and pertinacious opponents can find no fault with any part of the conduct of an eminent believer, except they can convert his piety and steadfastness in the faith, into an accusation against him. He, who enabled Daniel thus to "walk in wisdom towards them that were without," in his difficult situation, and thus wrought more powerfully than when he protected him in the den of lions, is equally able to give us wisdom and grace sufficient for us, that we may copy his example, and by well-doing put to shame and silence those that would falsely accuse our good conversation in Christ. Yet this conduct of believers often drives their enemies to open persecution, as their only weapon. How much are powerful princes surrounded by designing men, whose flatteries are the covering of their malice and selfishness! and how pride, and vain-glory lay men open to be imposed on by the grossest artifices! Whilst they affect to be honoured as gods, they are proved to want the understanding of men: and the palpable absurdities, which have been sanctioned by the authority of renowned monarchs, and by the approbation of senates and councils, are a libel on human nature, as if intended to expose the folly and impiety of our fallen race. It is well that no human laws can deprive us of the privilege of asking petitions of the God of heaven: for except he continually uphold, protect, and supply us, with all things needful for soul and body, we must sink into extreme misery. Were the Lord as regardless of men, as they are of him, and did he withhold his communications as long as they do their petitions and thanksgivings, they would speedily be left without comfort or hope. Yet how little is this considered! Indeed, it is to be feared, that they who, (without any prohibitory decree,) present no hearty and serious prayers to God, for more than thirty days together, are far more numerous than they who serve him continually, and worship him with bended knees and humble thankful hearts, praying and giving thanks to him three times a day. No wonder then that laws have been more frequently made to restrain, than to encourage, serious godliness: for, alas! the majority even of legislators hitherto have been strangers or enemies to the truth, and have hated it for interfering with their worldly pursuits and pleasures.

V. 10—17.

Persecuting and sanguinary laws are always enacted on false pretences, and are replete with absurdity, impiety, and injustice: but it does not behoove Christians to vent bitter complaints or sarcastical revilings. We should quietly obey God rather than man, and commit the keeping of our lives and souls to him in well-doing; and instead of intermitting the exercise of our religion to escape the cross, we should count ourselves called to make a more open profession of it: for that conduct, which in ordinary cases might appear ostentatious, becomes in other circumstances a proper protest against prevailing impiety, and an edifying example to our brethren. Such Christians, and ministers especially, as are of eminent reputation, should deem themselves, on these emergencies, called on to stand forth in the most intrepid and decided manner, and to risk all consequences by a conduct that may not be required of more obscure persons. But the most eminent servants of God will see cause to prostrate themselves before him, with every expression of the most profound reverence, humility, and self-abasement, and the most entire reliance on his mercy through the mediation of Christ. They that fill the most exalted stations, and are most extensively useful, must not only find time for communion with God, but should abound in it more than others; having more to pray and to return thanks for: and with advancing years men should grow more fervent and constant in their devotions; that the consolations of God may make up the loss of other comforts, or the want of relish for them; and that they may constantly be in a proper frame for joining the worship of the saints in light. But in this evil world, that conduct which most accords to the will of God, will often be turned into matter of accusation against us. It is, however, far "better to suffer for well-"doing than for evil-doing:" for though pious persons cannot place much confidence in the protection even of those princes whom they have most faithfully served, and who are most convinced of their wisdom and uprightness; yet they may in all cases be assured of the divine favour and consolation. Various personal and political interests may render kings irresolute in defending their best friends against the assaults of their enemies. They may inconsiderately give the occasion of injuring them: and however displeased with themselves, or earnest in labouring to extricate them from danger, they may with sorrow find that they cannot do it, without hazarding such consequences, or making such sacrifices, as they dare not venture on. Thus, fear of man, iniquitous laws, foolish and rash measures, and malignant accusers, may concur in extorting the sentence of condemnation against those who deserve all possible honour and reward. But that God, whom believers serve continually, is able to deliver them out of every danger and temptation; and to defeat all the purposes of their persecutors to destroy them: and it is far better to trust in him than to put any confidence in princes.

Even the most powerful of men may pity where he cannot deliver, and mourn over those oppressions that he cannot redress; and be constrained or seduced into those measures which fill his heart with anguish, his conscience with remorse, and mar all his enjoyments. So vain is all earthly greatness! And so unavailing all the materials of earthly satisfaction! But the persecuted believer may be happy in the most dreary dungeon, or the most perilous situation; as nothing can exclude him from the throne of grace, or from that "peace of God which passeth all "understanding." Through faith even the mouths of lions may be stopped: if temporal safety be good for us, we shall be preserved in the very jaws of destruction: hungry lions shall be harmless as lambs, and their presence shall only tend to increase our admiration of the Lord's power, and our gratitude for his goodness: and even Satan, that "roaring lion, who goeth about seeking whom he may "devour," shall be so restrained, that he shall not be able to harm, or even to frighten us, whilst we rest on the promises, and attend to the commandments, of our God. We should then exercise ourselves to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man, that we may rejoice in its testimony in difficult circumstances: we should be ready to answer with meekness and kindness even those that have injured us, especially if they are sensible of their fault. However our temporal trials may end, we shall come forth of them all: and no hurt will be found on those who have believed in God and kept his way. But whilst their troubles terminate in their greater honour, comfort, and felicity: the short-lived triumphing of the wicked will end in their unpitied and irreversible ruin; in which their relatives are often involved along with them. Thus "the LORD taketh the wise in their own craftiness;" and their devices against him give him an occasion of making known his own eternal power and Godhead among the nations, and of bringing such as were far off to adore and tremble before him. He is the living and unchangeable God, who alone is steadfast for ever: his decrees, purposes, and laws, are, and ought to be, established so that none can change them: "His is the kingdom, the power,

"and the glory for ever:" and "he delivereth and res-"cueth, and worketh signs, and wonders, in heaven and "earth." These things are sometimes made evident even to such as are not influenced to worship him: and many are employed as his instruments in making known his perfections and wonderful works to others, who themselves remain strangers to his saving grace. May we then be believers and doers of the word; and not merely hear, preach, or write about it, lest we should be found at last to have deceived our ownselves.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1. The preceding chapter concluded the historical records, which Daniel was directed to transmit to posterity: in this he begins to relate his own prophetical visions. In the first year of Belshazzar's reign, or seventeen years before the events just recorded, a visionary representation was made to his mind in a dream, which he committed to writing, and communicated to his people. It contains for substance the same prophetical intimations with Nebuchadnezzar's dream, (ii.) but under different allusions, and with several additional circumstances.

V. 2, 3. The great sea agitated by the four winds, represented the earth and its inhabitants, as thrown into perpetual convulsions by ambitious princes and mighty conquerors; and the confusion and wild uproar excited by their furious contests for victory and dominion. The four beasts signified the same, with the four constituent parts of Nebuchadnezzar's visionary image. To his carnal mind, mighty conquerors and extensive flourishing empires would have a show of glory, which was represented by a splendid and immense image: to the spiritual mind of Daniel, they would only appear terrible, odious, and destructive, which was more aptly denoted by devouring beasts. (Note, ii. 31.) They arose out of the sea, not all at once, but one after another: which signified that these kingdoms would subvert and succeed each other, as well as acquire dominion over other nations. They were also diverse from one another, and like the image, whose head was of gold, &c. the first was the more noble, the last most terrible.

V. 4. The Chaldean empire, as advanced to its summit of prosperity under Nebuchadnezzar, and as declining under Belshazzar, was intended by this beast. The lion was an emblem of Nebuchadnezzar's courage and success in acquiring the dominion over his neighbours; and perhaps of his superior generosity and magnanimity, with which he ruled over the nations. The eagle's wings denoted the rapidity and unabated vigour with which he prosecuted his victories. But as the prophet saw this, he observed, "that the wings thereof were plucked." After the death of Nebuchadnezzar, the Chaldeans made no more conquests; several of the subjected nations revolted; the Medes and Persians soon began to straiten them; till at length Babylon was besieged and taken, and so that monarchy was terminated. No longer did this beast appear rapid in conquest, as an eagle, or courageous and terrible as a lion: but it was changed as it were into a human creature; it "stood on its feet as a man, and had a man's "heart given to it." After Nebuchadnezzar's death, the kings of Babylon became less terrible to their foes and subjects, and more cautious and even timid: till at length Belshazzar shut himself up in Babylon, not daring to face Cyrus: as a man would not venture to face a raging bear, which a lion would despise. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. Whilst Daniel beheld how the first beast was weakened, he saw another beast come up out of the sea, to subvert and supplant him. This represented the kingdom of the Medes and Persians. Its emblem was a bear; less noble and courageous, but more voracious and savage, than a lion. This beast raised up itself on one side; for the Medes and Persians extended their conquests almost wholly to the west of their own countries: or, "it raised "up one dominion," (Marg.) that is, the Medes and Persians united to form one kingdom; or the Persians who were the inferior people, would acquire the chief dominion. It had also three ribs between its teeth: this is interpreted of the three kingdoms of Babylon, Lydia, and Egypt, which the Persians conquered, and grievously oppressed: thus taking the prey, as it were, out of the mouth of the Chaldeans. And there were those standing by, who called on the beast to arise and devour much flesh: this may be explained of the providential dispensations, which excited the Medes and Persians to attempt such extensive conquests; and of the cruelty of the Persian kings, which hardly ever was exceeded or equalled: but may it not also denote their attempts to subdue the Thracians, Macedonians, Greeks, and other European nations, which at length occasioned the ruin of their monarchy? 'Their success made them 'more greedy of dominion.' (Lowth.)

V. 6. This bear having disappeared, the prophet saw an extraordinary leopard rise up in its stead. This was the emblem of the Grecian or Macedonian empire, which for the time was the most renowned in the world. It was erected by Alexander the Great on the ruins of the Persian monarchy, and it continued in four divisions under his successors. The leopard, being exceedingly fierce and swift, represented that kingdom, and especially Alexander, its founder. But the swiftness of a quadruped was not an adequate emblem of the rapidity with which he made his conquests; as he subdued nations more speedily than others could march their armies through them. The leopard had therefore four wings of a fowl upon his back.—When Alexander died, his kingdom was, after many contests among his captains, divided into four parts, Egypt, Syria, Macedonia, and Thrace, with some regions of Asia Minor. These were the four heads of this third beast; and under them dominion was given to it, till it was gradually reduced by the Romans. 'By the swiftness 'of Alexander's progress, and the victories which he ob-'tained by small forces, it appeared that Providence gave 'him the empire of the world.' (Lowth.)

V. 7, 8. (Notes, 19—26.) Many expositors have explained this fourth beast, of the successors of Alexander, and have endeavoured to make out Antiochus Epiphanes to be the little horn. But were any, or all, of Alexander's successors more powerful and dreadful than he had been? Were their conquests more extensive and destructive than his? For those of this fourth beast evidently were. The ten horns were kings, or kingdoms, (according to the language of prophecy,) all existing at once, and not individual princes rising in succession. The little horn was not one of the ten, but arose among and after them: and this beast, in one form or other, was to subsist till the establishment of the kingdom of Christ, as afterwards predicted. These reasons have induced almost all modern protestant expositors to look elsewhere for this fourth beast: and the emblems are so apposite, that there can be little danger of mistake, or reason for hesitation, as to the grand outlines. This fourth beast evidently accords with the legs and feet of iron, which were seen by Nebuchadnezzar in his visionary image, and which were at length divided into ten toes, (Notes, ii. 40—45.) It far exceeded in power, fierceness, and destructive rage, all that had gone before it, as well as in the extent and long duration of its dominions: and no animal could be found so terrible and furious as to lend it a suitable name. This was doubtless an emblem of the Roman state, the invincible fortitude, hardiness, and force of which perhaps were never equalled. By wars and conquests the Romans bore down all opposition, and reduced almost every kingdom or state in the known world into some kind or degree of dependence; drew all the spoil and wealth of many conquered nations to enrich their proud capital; and tyrannized over all that did not quietly yield obedience to their authority. 'That which the Ro-'mans could not quietly enjoy in other countries, they 'would give to other kings and rulers, that, at all times 'when they would, they might take it again; which libe-'rality is here called, stamping the rest under their feet.' This fourth empire was governed in another manner, and by other maxims than any of the preceding: and in process of time it was divided into ten kingdoms, which have been thus numbered in the eighth century. 1. The senate of Rome. 2. The Greeks at Ravenna. 3. The Lombards in Lombardy. 4. The Huns of Hungary. 5. The Alemanes in Germany. 6. The Franks in France. 7. The Burgundians in Burgundy. 8. The Goths in Spain. 9. The Britons. 10. The Saxons in Britain. They are indeed reckoned up in several ways, by different writers, according to the date assigned to their enumeration: but in general it is clear that they were nearly the same with the principal kingdoms in Europe at this day; excepting some of the more northern regions, and those possessed by the Turks. —It is, however, certain, that the Roman empire was divided into ten kingdoms: and though they might be sometimes more and sometimes fewer, yet they were still known by the name of the ten kingdoms of the western empire. For though the Romans subdued those countries in the east, which had successively belonged to the Chaldeans, the Persians, and the Macedonians, yet their empire, (or the body, head, and horns of the beast,) was in the west. 'All the four beasts are still alive, though the 'dominion of the three first be taken away. The nations 'of Chaldea and Assyria are still the first beast. Those 'of Media and Persia are still the second beast. Those of 'Macedonia, Greece, Thrace, Asia Minor, Syria, and 'Egypt, are still the third; and those of Europe, on this 'side Greece, are still the fourth. Seeing therefore the 'body of the third beast is confined to the nations on this 'side the river Euphrates; and the body of the fourth 'beast, to the nations on this side Greece; we are to 'look for all the four heads of the third beast, among the 'nations on this side the Euphrates; and for all the eleven 'horns of the fourth beast, among the nations on this side 'of Greece. And therefore at the breaking of the Greek 'empire into four kingdoms, we include no part of the 'Chaldeans, Medes, and Persians, in those kingdoms; 'because they belonged to the bodies of the two first 'beasts. Nor do we reckon the Greek empire seated at 'Constantinople, among the horns of the fourth beast;

9 I beheld [z] till the thrones were cast down, and [a] the Ancient of days did sit, [b] whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool: [c] his throne was like the fiery flame, [d] and his wheels as burning fire.

10 A [e] fiery stream issued and came forth from before him: [f] thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: [g] the judgment was set, and the books were opened.

11 I beheld then, because of [h] the voice of the great words which the horn spake: I beheld, [i] even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame.

12 As concerning [k] the rest of the beasts, they had their dominion taken away: yet * their lives were prolonged for a season and time.

13 I saw in the night-visions, and, behold, [l] one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to [m] the Ancient of days, [n] and they brought him near before him.

14 And there was [o] given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, [p] that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is [q] an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed

[c] because it belonged to the body of the third.' (Sir Is. Newton. Whilst the prophet was considering these ten horns, he saw another little horn springing up among them. This evidently points out the power of the Church and Bishop of Rome, which, from small beginnings, thrust itself up among the ten kingdoms, and at length got possession of three of them, having turned out those who held them: viz. the Exarchate of Ravenna, the kingdom of the Lombards, and the state of Rome, (according to the most probable opinion; and the dominion of the Roman Pontiff over these three kingdoms has ever since been denoted by his triple crown. In this horn, as the Church of Rome became, when it obtained temporal authority,) were "eyes like the eyes of a man." This circumstance denoted the policy, sagacity, subtlety, and watchfulness, by which the little horn would spy out occasions of extending and establishing its interests, and advancing its exorbitant pretensions; and the court of Rome has ever been remarkable for this above all the states in the world, as every person at all acquainted with history must know. It had also a mouth speaking great things: and we shall have frequent occasion to speak of the arrogant claims, blasphemous titles, and great swelling words of vanity, of this horn. The style of "his holiness," and the claim of infallibility, and of a power to dispense with God's laws, to forgive sins, and to sell admission into heaven, may serve for a specimen of the great things which this mouth hath spoken. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9—14. The prophet continued to contemplate the scene till at length all these thrones were cast down; and the Ancient of days, or the eternal God, who existed before time was, even from everlasting, was emblematically represented as placed on his throne. "His garment white "as snow," was the emblem of his most perfect justice and holiness; "the hair of his head like the pure wool," denoted his unerring wisdom and awful majesty; "his "throne like the fiery flame," signified his terrible vengeance on the wicked; and "his wheels" (on which it was fixed as a chariot) "as burning fire," showed that his providence would execute the awful sentence of his justice on his enemies. (Marg. Ref.) This was also denoted, and its terror illustrated, by "the fiery stream that came "forth from before him." An immense multitude of angels ministered unto him; and unnumbered millions of his creatures were gathered before his tribunal; for "the judgment was set, and the books were opened;" the book of his law, and of these prophecies, and the register of the offences of the criminals to be judged, &c. This language is applicable to the general judgment, but that cannot be the prophetical meaning of the passage; for it is plain that God the Father is here spoken of as the Judge: whereas the Son will appear as the sole Judge in the day of final retribution: the fulfilment of this prophecy will precede the introduction of the millennium, the final judgment will succeed to the consummation of all things here on earth. In short, this was spoken of the coming of the Lord to destroy the kingdom of antichrist, and to set up the kingdom of God on earth. For the great God, being filled with indignation at the blasphemous words of the little horn, will destroy all the remains of the power of the fourth beast, to which it belongs; that is, of the Roman empire, as inimical to the cause of Christ: and his body shall be destroyed and given to the flames, because the little horn was the ringleader to the beast, in tyranny, cruelty, and idolatry; and because of the close connexion betwixt it and the other ten horns. Rome will be wholly desolated, and her hierarchy abolished; every antichristian power will be crushed; and the whole will be reduced under the government of Christ, and those who rule under and for him. The other beasts had indeed been deprived of dominion, yet their lives were prolonged for a season: the countries that had been governed by the Chaldeans, Persians, and Macedonians, though no longer in possession of empire, yet continued under the government of idolaters, or enemies to true religion: for a beast, in the prophetical language, is an idolatrous or persecuting power: but when the fourth beast shall lose his authority, his life also shall be taken away, and no idolatrous or antichristian power shall remain in any nation; for then the other beasts must be slain, which is intimated by their lives being spared for a season. The prophet further saw one like the Son of man coming with, or in, the clouds of heaven; that is, with divine majesty and glory; this must point out Christ to us, as the eternal Son of God, appearing in human nature, ascending to heaven, the throne of God, to receive the kingdom covenanted to him; (Ps. ii. 8, 9.) He came to the Ancient of days, who sat on the throne, and was brought in before him by the angelic attendants; and he received a glorious, universal, and everlasting kingdom, which would never vanish, or be subverted, or succeeded by any other. 'This passage not only shows, that the 'setting up of the everlasting kingdom, was to happen in 'the times of the fourth, or Roman, monarchy; but also, 'that it would happen when the Son of man would ascend 'from earth to heaven. The prophet does not represent 'him as coming in the clouds from heaven to earth, (as 'at the general judgment;) but as coming with the clouds 'of heaven from his former residence, towards the throne 'of God; which according to the Scripture-style is heaven. 'And this is confirmed by the words immediately follow-'ing; that "they brought him near before him," viz. 'before the Ancient of days.' 'Though the immediate 'Ruler of this kingdom is called the Son of man; yet it is 'obvious, that there is something very amazing in the 'prophetic description of the high honour and glory that 'should be given to him! Whoever considers these expres-'sions,' (in the fourteenth verse,) 'with impartiality,—'whatever be his sentiments otherwise about the Person 'spoken of, must own, that there is at least some diffi-'culty in conceiving how such everlasting glory and 'dominion should belong to any one who should be no 'more than the son of man, or a mere creature; and 'particularly in conceiving how such magnificent things 'should be ascribed to one who was no more than the son 'of man, by the prophets, who inculcated so strongly 'and justly, that all mere creatures are, before God, as 'nothing, and less than nothing.' (Maclaurin.) When Christ was about to ascend into heaven, he said, "All "power is given to me in heaven and earth." Then his kingdom began to be set up, and the power of the fourth kingdom to decline: but it is plain from the eleventh verse, that the grand event predicted in this passage, is, his glorious coming to destroy the kingdom of Antichrist, and to render his own kingdom universal upon earth. (Marg. Ref.) A careful examination of the marginal references will throw much light on this subject; and show the exact coincidence of the several prophetical writers, both in the Old and New Testament, in respect of these events.

V. 15—18. When Daniel had considered these emblems of future times, he foresaw that idolatrous empires would occasion much mischief to the Church of God, before a happy event could be expected: yet he did not fully understand what was meant, nor how matters would end; and he was therefore much grieved and troubled in mind. So, desiring information from one of the numerous attendants "of Him that sat on the throne," he received the following interpretation. In general, the four beasts signified four kings, or kingdoms, that were to arise up on earth, which would oppose the Church of God; yet the saints would at length take the kingdom, and possess it for ever, not only personally in heaven, but collectively on earth, after the ruin of the fourth kingdom; for they would rule with and for Christ to the end of time, and nothing would succeed this kingdom on earth but the everlasting glory of heaven. It is with reference to this, probably, that the Apostle says, "The promise, that he should "be the heir of the world was given to Abraham." (Rom. iv. 13.)

—Out of the earth. 'Shall be of the earth, earthly, 'and have nothing of an heavenly spirit in them.' (Lowth.)

V. 19—22. Daniel seems to have been satisfied with knowing in general, that the three first kingdoms would resemble such monarchies as he had seen: but he was anxious to learn more about the kingdom intended by the fourth beast, which was so different from all the rest, and so formidable with teeth of iron, and nails of brass, &c.—The nails of brass were not before mentioned. Brass was the emblem of the third kingdom in Nebuchadnezzar's dream: and some suppose this to intimate, that the fourth kingdom would employ the power of the third kingdom in the east, to oppress other nations: though the seat of the fourth kingdom, the body of the beast, was in the west! The prophet, however, supposed this to represent some more formidable enemy of the Church, than any of the others: as well as far more powerful and oppressive in its conquests. He wanted also to know something more 23 Thus he said, The fourth beast shall be [f] the fourth kingdom upon earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces.

24 And [g] the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise: [h] and another shall rise after them; and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings.

25 And he [i] shall speak great words against the most High, and shall [k] wear out the saints of the most High, [l] and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand until [m] a time, and times, and the dividing of time.

26 But [n] the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end.

27 And [o] the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the most High, [p] whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, [q] and all * dominions shall serve and obey him.

of the ten horns: but especially of the little horn, of which he had further observed, that "his look was more stout "than his fellows." The Roman court and Pontiff, from very inconsiderable beginnings, for many ages domineered over those kingdoms intended by the ten horns, in the most audacious manner; laying them under interdicts and excommunications, levying heavy taxes on them; deposing kings, and disposing of their dominions; absolving their subjects from their oaths of allegiance, and exciting them to rebellions and insurrections; claiming a supremacy in all causes, and trampling on the greatest monarchs, in such ways as never was done by any other power. Daniel had also noticed, that this horn had made war with and prevailed against the saints: accordingly the persecutions, massacres, and religious wars, excited by the Church and bishop of Rome, have occasioned the shedding of far more blood of the saints of God, than all the persecutions of professed Heathens from the foundation of the world. This is the character of the same power, described by St. John as "the great harlot, who was drunk with the blood of "the saints and martyrs of Jesus." (Rev. xvii. 6.) It was predicted also that this horn would prevail against the saints, and grievously oppress them; until the Ancient of days should come, to give judgment against it, in favour of his saints; and till they should be put in full possession of the kingdom, as one with Christ their glorious head; and this certainly refers to future times. These were the particulars, which Daniel wanted to have interpreted to him: and there was a great propriety in matters of this nature being thus fully revealed to him, whose chief concern must have been about the affairs of the Church and of true religion: whilst Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the same four monarchies related wholly to their temporal dominion.

V. 23—27. The answer of the angel to Daniel's inquiry has been particularly adverted to in the preceding interpretation. He informed the prophet, that the fourth beast was the fourth kingdom, which should arise upon earth: and this could be no other than the Roman empire. This would be "diverse from all the others:" the kingdoms of Alexander's successors were not remarkably different from those that had preceded them; but the Roman state was entirely dissimilar from them all, in its forms of government, and in various particulars. It would "devour the whole earth, and tread it down and break it in "pieces:" if we should explain this only of the land of Judah, it is obvious that the Chaldeans did more harm to that land, than ever the successors of Alexander did; and not so much as the Romans: but it evidently refers to their extensive conquests in every part of the known world. When this kingdom had been divided into ten horns, or kingdoms, another should come up among them and after them, diverse from the first, who should subdue three kings, or three of the kingdoms before-mentioned, (8.) But how was Antiochus Epiphanes different from his predecessors? Or how could he subdue three of the kings, that were in order of succession before him? Or how could he come up after the ten horns, if he were one of them? We can therefore find this little horn no where but within the Roman empire. The monstrous power of the church and bishop of Rome hath been far more different from every other species of tyranny, than the Roman empire was from all other monarchies: and we have seen how this power subdued three of the ten kingdoms. This little horn would "speak great things against the most High;" and let it be noted how much stress is laid on this circumstance; and we have noticed, and shall have frequent occasion to mention, some of the blasphemous and impious words of the Roman Antichrist. He would also "wear "out the saints of the most High." The persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes were only for a few years; whereas those of the Pope and his instruments have continued through many centuries; and, though now somewhat suspended, are probably not terminated; so that their duration and severity have worn out the saints of God, more than any other ever did. He would also think, or devise "to change times and laws." It could not be considered as any thing very singular for a king to alter the laws in his own dominions, or as to secular matters; and no change greatly for the worse could be made in the religious laws and customs of the idolatrous nations: but that the little horn should presume to change the laws respecting religion, (not excepting the laws of God;) and this through the dominions of the other ten horns, as well as in his own petty kingdom, would be wonderful indeed! But the close connexion of this little horn with the other ten horns; its influence over them, and their destruction, as well as his, in consequence of this connexion, evidently shows, that this was what the prophet beheld with astonishment. And hath not the papal power arrogated the prerogative of making times holy or unholy, contrary to the word of God? He hath commanded men every where to abstain from meat, and cease from work, when God required no such thing; and has multiplied his holy days, till scarcely four of the six working days have been left for man's labour: at the same time he hath licensed intemperance and excess on his festivals and carnivals, and authorized licentious diversions on the Lord's own holy day. He hath pretended to change God's laws, or to dispense with obedience to them, that his own new laws might be observed, forbidding to marry, and licensing fornication, and many things of this sort. Thus matters would be left in his hands, "till a time, and times, and the dividing of time," that is, for three years and a half, or forty-two months, which, reckoning thirty days to a month, (and this was the general computation,) make just one thousand two hundred and sixty days; and those prophetical days signify one thousand two hundred and sixty years; a number we shall repeatedly meet with in the revelation of St. John. (Marg. Ref.) At the expiration of this term, which is now not far distant, the dominion of this horn will cease; he will be judged, condemned, and consumed, and his authority never revived to the end of the world. Then "the kingdom under the whole heaven will be given to "the people of the saints." The most High will set up his everlasting and universal kingdom, all other rulers and governors will serve and obey him. Can this mean any thing less, than an universal prevalence of true religion, under the countenance of Christian princes, even to the end of the world, without any remarkable declension, or successful opposition? And hath not enough of this extraordinary prophecy been already fulfilled, to warrant our assurance, that the remainder will be so too, as well as to demonstrate the divinity of the Scriptures?—'Thus the 'second as well as the first prophecy of this book, relating to the four empires, reaches down below the end 'of the Roman empire, and to the universal empire of 'the Messiah.'—'The great things said to be done by the 'little horn, and the continuance of his power to the 'time of the universal conversion of the nations, put it 'beyond all question, that it is not one particular person 'that is meant, but a very long succession.'—'He is 'never called any other than a little horn.—His greatness 'is chiefly placed in great words and looks, joined with 'singular penetration and cunning; which is of itself a 'presumption, that the great things he was to accomplish 'would be owing to the power of others, voluntarily 'giving their power to him, after having been seduced by 'him.'—'The following small number of characters, to 'be gathered by plain and easy reasoning from a few pas-'sages in one prophet, (Daniel,) make up a singular 'description, not applicable to any power, that ever was, 'or will be, but one.'—'A seducing power that was to 'arise, after the conversion, the downfal and division of 'the Roman empire, established in the western parts of 'that empire, when divided into so many, (ten) sove-'reignties; little, in comparison of these others as to 'secular authority; but claiming and obtaining an univer-'sal spiritual authority over the body of the western king-'doms; acquiring and maintaining this through policy and 'craft;—procuring a voluntary surrender of power from 'really superior sovereigns; improving it so as to be a 'ringleader to these others in apostacy, persecution, and 'various kinds of opposition to the truth; and continuing 'to exert such power for such ends, during a considerable 'number of ages.' (Maclaurin.)

Daniel's vision of the ram, and the he-goat that overcame the ram, 1—8. The horn of the goat is broken, and four horns

V. 28. Daniel, from this interpretation, foreseeing the calamities of the Church, for so long a season previous to the joyful termination of them, was greatly troubled in mind, which affected his body also. He, however, laid up the matter in his memory and heart, that he might meditate on it, and derive instruction from it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—14.

Those splendid achievements, and that extensive authority, which excite admiration, applause, envy, or ambition, often rank men with destructive hurricanes and savage beasts, in the judgment of God and of his saints. They are the instruments of divine vengeance on a guilty world, which is kept in perpetual agitation by their contests; as the great sea by the raging of the conflicting winds. They are indeed diverse from each other; but they agree in their aim to aggrandize themselves, and to gain the dominion, by making havoc of the human species, and trampling men under their feet; and many around them, by their flattering encomiums and delusive oratory, call on them "to arise and devour much flesh." The greater renown such chieftains receive with posterity, the more mischievous were they to their contemporaries: and whilst our youth are taught to admire the exploits of the Greeks and Romans; they are seldom led to reflect on the dire carnage and wide-spread desolations, which their wars occasioned. No savage beast, nor even the worst qualities of them all put together, can equal the odious constituents of an ambitious conqueror's character: and an Alexander, or a Julius Cæsar, may be considered as a compound of pride, ambition, selfishness, rage, and cruelty; whilst he can glory in the slaughter of a million of his own species, for the sole purpose of advancing his own reputation and greatness, or of extending the dominions and wealth of his idolized country. But when we look at such beasts as dreadful and terrible, and exceedingly strong, and consider their fatal successes: we should recollect, that they are under the secret direction of God, whose "counsel shall stand, and he will do all his plea-"sure:" and thus we shall be preserved from either admiring or dreading them. For these lions, and monsters of more savage breed, are all chained: the dominion given them has its appointed extent and duration; their wrath shall turn to the praise of the Lord, and the remainder of it he will restrain. Whilst he has work for come up in its stead, 9. A little horn springs up from one of them, and becomes exceedingly great, and does great mischief, 10—12. The duration of these events, 13, 14. Gabriel interprets the vision, and shows Daniel that it related to the kingdom of the Medes and Persians as conquered by the Macedonians, and to a power that would thence arise to persecute the church, 15—25. them as his executioners, they have rapid success; when that is done, they disappear or are broken in pieces: and as one of them after another is removed, and the earth seems to be at rest, being delivered from a scourge and a curse, another perhaps rises up still more outrageous and mischievous. But in whatever form, age, or place, they practice and prosper; or whatever be their courage and sagacity, or their arrogance, impiety, and cruelty, in war, or in persecution; their thrones will be cast down, to make way for the kingdom of the Ancient of days, the everlasting God, whose works and counsels are all in glorious justice, holiness, wisdom, and majesty; and whose wrath is a devouring fire against all his enemies. He will put down all authority that exalteth itself against him; and the terrible displays of his power and wrath, in his temporal judgments on the nations, form an emblem of that day, when we must all appear before his tribunal, to give an account of our works; "when the "books shall be opened, and all whose names shall not "be found written in the book of life, will be cast into "the lake of fire;" "when thousand thousands shall mi-"nister unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand "shall stand before him." Ere that solemn decisive season shall arrive, for the manifestation of the Lord's glory to all worlds, in his dealings with his creatures, the doom of each of us will be determined, at the hour of our death: and before the end shall come, the Father will openly and actually give unto his incarnate Son, our Mediator and Judge, the inheritance of the nations, as his willing subjects. Of this he gave a proof, when he raised him from the dead, and gave him glory; when he ascended up on high, and was brought by his attending angels before the Ancient of days, and all power in heaven and earth was given to him.

Hitherto it hath been permitted, that the depravity of man should be exposed, in the conduct of many rivals and competitors to the Lord of Glory; of many Antichrists, who have opposed his cause, and made havoc of innumerable multitudes of his saints; and have prevented the success of their efforts in spreading that glorious cause, which they loved more than their lives. Yet they have never prevented the eternal felicity of any one chosen vessel of mercy; nor could the gates of hell ever prevail against the Church. Idolatry, impiety, arrogance, and persecution, have generally been concomitants; and have always been odious and pernicious; but never so odious and pernicious, as when covered with a mask of religion. There have been and will be many Antichrists: but he "that sits in the temple of God, and exalts himself above "all that is called God, or is worshipped," hath been more fierce and stout than his fellows; and hath worn out the saints of the most High, and thought to change times and laws, more than they all: and this condemnation will be proportionably dreadful; for the judgment shall sit, and "the Lord will destroy him with the breath of his "mouth, and with the brightness of his coming." Other tyrants and persecutors may be spared for a season, even when dethroned; but this enemy shall be wholly destroyed, and cast into the fire. Then all idolatry and false worship shall cease, and our Redeemer shall receive dominion and glory, and a kingdom over all people, nations, and languages, which shall never pass away nor be destroyed.—We must not indeed be ambitious of temporal power, nor use unhallowed means to subvert even Antichristian tyranny: but we may pray to the Lord to plead his own cause, and fulfil his word, and to make his truth victorious: we may desire to be instrumental in forwarding these happy events, in any way in which it may please God to employ us: and we may anticipate with joy those glorious times, when all nations shall fall down before our Redeemer, "and all kings shall do him service;" and when every throne on earth shall be filled by those that do his will and seek his glory. We should make serious inquiry into these matters, as well as into other parts of God's word: and, by proper examination and humble prayer, we shall thence deduce encouragement to our hope, and find strength added to our faith. We should keep them in our hearts, and expect the approaching period, when the saints shall receive the kingdom, and their cause shall finally triumph over all opposition: and the trouble, arising from the views which we receive of the sufferings to be endured by God's people, will be counterbalanced by the expectation of so glorious a catastrophe. May we be numbered with the saints, now they are under the cross, that we may share all their triumphs, and be numbered with them in glory everlasting.

city of the Persian empire; and many commentators suppose, that Daniel was there only in vision, (as Ezekiel had been carried to Jerusalem,) and that he was actually at Babylon at the time: for they cannot conceive what he should do at Shushan, when Belshazzar, who employed him, was at war with the Medes and Persians. But he might be at Shushan, as employed in some embassy from Belshazzar to Cyrus, or some of the parties engaged in war against him. It is, however, probable that Shushan was at this time in the hands of the king of Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar conquered Elam, according to Jeremiah's prediction; (Jer. xlix. 34—39;) and it does not appear that Cyrus had at this time retaken it. Elam is indeed sometimes used for Persia; but the province of Elam was only a part of that country. 'Daniel's residing in the 'palace at Shushan, shows that he still continued in those 'posts of honour to which Nebuchadnezzar had advanced 'him.' (27.) (Lowth.)

V. 3, 4. The kingdom of Media and Persia, before represented by a voracious bear, (vii. 5,) was on this occasion shown to Daniel, under the form of a ram with two horns. (20.) The bear aptly described the nature of this monarchy; but the ram with two horns, was its known emblem in those countries. The original word for a ram, and that for Elam, or Persia, have a great affinity: it was usual for the kings of Persia to wear a diadem made like a ram's head, of gold: and it is said, that "rams' "heads with horns, one higher and the other lower, are "still to be seen on the pillars at Persepolis." The Chaldean monarchy was drawing near to its end, when Daniel had this vision; and its subversion had been sufficiently predicted: this vision therefore was introduced by the emblem of the Medo-Persian empire. The two horns of this ram, one higher than the other, do not mean Darius and Cyrus, or any two princes; for the ram had two horns, when he was smitten by the goat, or the Macedonians: but they signify the joint power of the Medes and Persians forming one monarchy. The Medes were the most ancient of the two nations, and had been most eminent; but the Persians became most powerful and renowned: so that the higher horn came up last. This ram, though comparatively so feeble an animal, was seen pushing with his horns, westward, northward, and southward, so that none could withstand or escape him, or prevent his executing his purposes, and becoming great. Persia lay to the east of Babylon; and the kings extended their conquests westward, as far as the Egean sea; north and north-west, they subdued various people even to the Caspian and Euxine sea; and to the south and south-west, they vanquished Egypt and several of the adjacent regions. Some of the later kings of Persia indeed carried their arms also into the east; but this was not within the observation of the Jews, or of much consequence to them.

V. 5—7. Whilst the prophet beheld with astonishment the fury and success of the ram, he observed an he-goat come from the west to oppose him: this was afterwards interpreted to mean the kingdom of Greece or Macedonia. A goat was the known emblem of this kingdom; and the Macedonians had been long called the goats' people: 'For Caranus going with a great multitude of 'Greeks, to seek new habitations in Macedonia, was 'commanded by the oracle to take the goats for his guides 'to empire; and afterwards seeing a herd of goats fleeing 'from a violent storm; he followed them to Edessa, and 'there fixed the seat of the empire, made the goats his 'ensigns, and called the city Ægeæ, or the goats' town, 'and the people Ægeadæ, or the goats' people.' (Bp. Newton.) The Persian kings had made many very formidable but unsuccessful attempts to subdue the Greeks, and by repeated injuries they had so exasperated the whole nation, that laying aside their quarrels with each other, they united against the common enemy. The politics and successes of Philip, king of Macedon, and other circumstances, had concurred to make way for Alexander the Great to accomplish his design of leading an army into Asia, to conquer if possible the Persian empire. With a small body of most valiant and well disciplined soldiers, the flower of Greece and Macedon, he marched into Asia; and his progress and successes were so rapid, that his army seemed, as it were, to fly above, and not to touch the surface of the earth: and when Darius the Persian king came to meet him, with armies perhaps twenty times as large, he was attacked with such impetuosity, and routed with such immense slaughter, that by the loss of three great battles, his power was utterly broken, he was pursued as a fugitive, and at length slain by his own servants.

8 Therefore the he-goat waxed very great: and [n] when he was strong, [o] the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones, toward the four winds of heaven.

9 And out of one of them [p] came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great, toward the south, and toward the east, and toward [q] the pleasant land.

10 And it waxed great, even * to the [r] host of heaven, and it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, [s] and stamped upon them.

11 Yea, [t] he magnified himself even † to [u] the prince of the host, and ‡ by him [x] the daily sacrifice was taken away, [y] and the place of his sanctuary was cast down.

12 And § an host was [z] given him against the daily sacrifice, by reason of transgression, [a] and it cast down the truth to the ground; [b] and it practised, and prospered.

Afterwards Alexander with unexampled celerity marched his forces into every part of this vast empire, bearing down all opposition, and receiving the submission of cities and nations; till the ram, the Medo-Persian kingdom, was cast down to the ground, and trodden under foot by the victor, and none could deliver it, or any part of it, out of the hands of the Macedonians. When Alexander first menaced Asia with an invasion, Darius treated his proposals and designs with the most affronting contempt; and he afterwards attempted to bribe his physician to poison him: these injuries had so exasperated the king and his troops, that they pursued Darius rather as an assassin, than as a competitor for honour and empire; and the he-goat attacked the ram, as moved with choler against him. It is recorded, that this prophecy was shown to Alexander by the Jewish high priest on the following occasion. Whilst Alexander besieged Tyre, the high priest of the Jews refused to pay tribute to him, because he had sworn allegiance to Darius: and this refusal so enraged the conqueror, that he set out in great haste to avenge himself on that nation. But in answer to the prayers of the high-priest and people, the former was directed in a vision to go forth to meet Alexander, in his pontifical vestments, attended by the other priests in their sacred apparel: and when the enraged victor met this procession, he bowed down before the high-priest with religious awe and veneration. This behaviour astonished all present; but he informed them, that whilst he was planning his expedition at Dio in Macedon, he had seen in a dream this very person in this very habit, inviting him to come into Asia, and promising him success in his expedition; and that he now meant to adore the God of the Jews, (who had directed and prospered his expedition,) in the person of his high-priest. Accordingly he peaceably entered Jerusalem, and offered sacrifices at the temple, where the high-priest showed him these prophecies of Daniel, in which it was foretold that a king of Greece should subvert the Persian empire. It is certain that Alexander granted many peculiar privileges to the Jewish nation; and this can hardly be accounted for without admitting the truth of these events as recorded by Josephus.

V. 8. (Note, vii. 6.) After the Macedonian kingdom had arrived at vast greatness and power, Alexander was cut off, when he was in the prime of his life, and in the full career of victory and prosperity; through excessive intemperance, and not without the suspicion of poison. In a few years after, the insignificant remains of his family were extinct; and then the great and notable horn of the goat was broken. Afterwards his captains had fierce contests about his dominions; till at length, four kingdoms arose, which continued for some time, and were eminent in the world: the kingdom of Egypt was to the south; that of Syria, and its dependencies to the east; that of Thrace, with Bythinia, &c. to the north; and that of Macedonia to the west. (22.) Thus four horns sprang up from the head of the goat, in the place of the one which had been broken: but the power neither continued in the same family, nor was any one of these kingdoms equal to that of Alexander himself.

V. 9—12. (23—25.) The generality of expositors have interpreted this little horn to mean Antiochus Epiphanes, of whose persecutions we have an account in the books of Maccabees: and some have considered him as a type of Antichrist. Others, however, have attempted to show that this interpretation is not at all satisfactory; and they have given us quite another view of the subject. According to the first opinion, this part of prophecy may be interpreted as follows. From one of the four kingdoms, into which the dominions of Alexander were divided, came forth a little horn; which represented Antiochus Epiphanes, descending from the kings of Syria. This would occur "in the latter time of their kingdom," (23.) and Antiochus Epiphanes lived but a little time, before the Romans subdued the several divisions of the Grecian empire: it would also be "when the transgressors were come "to the full;" that is, when the Jews had made themselves ripe for judgment by their crimes. This horn denoted "a king of fierce countenance," and Antiochus was of a most ferocious cruelty; and one that "understood dark "sentences;" and he was a man of designing subtlety. "His power would become mighty, but not by his own "power:" which may mean, that from very low beginnings he would arise to great prosperity, not by the strength of his own kingdom, but by the assistance of his allies. For after the Romans had conquered his father Antiochus the Great, and exceedingly weakened his dominions; and Seleucus, his brother, had drained all his treasures to pay the sums stipulated to the Romans; Antiochus, who had been a hostage at Rome, hearing of his brother's death, returned home in a very obscure manner and low condition; but being favoured by Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and by others, he obtained the kingdom in preference to his brother's posterity, and became in time powerful and formidable: carrying war into Egypt, to the south, and into Persia, Armenia, &c.' to the east: and especially he subdued and oppressed the land of Judah, called the Pleasant Land, because of the temple and ordinances of God. Thus "he waxed great," and grew very proud, and employed his power "against the host of heaven," and "cast "down some of the stars to the ground, and stamped on "them;" this figuratively described his persecution of God's worshippers, and the cruelties which he exercised against many of the brightest, most excellent, and eminent persons among them. And he not only magnified himself against the high-priest, and the rulers of the Jews; but against God himself, "the Prince of this host," the Prince of princes: for he set up the image of Jupiter Olympus in the temple, profaned every thing with swines' flesh, compelled the Jews to blaspheme God; put a stop to the administration of all the sacred institutions, and desolated and polluted the whole sanctuary. For, to punish the sins of the Jews, "an host was given him against the "daily sacrifice," i. e. God gave him power to prevail against it; so that the truth was by him cast down to the ground, and he practised wickedness, and prospered in it: destroying the mighty and holy people of God, and accomplishing his deep and dark machinations, by the most crafty politics; behaving with the utmost contempt and arrogance; and making and infringing solemn treaties and agreements, to compass the destruction of multitudes. But at length, when he was coming, full of rage to execute vengeance on the Jews, who opposed his tyranny, he was seized with a most loathsome and dire disease, and died miserably, by the evident judgment of God, without the intervention of any human power. But many strong objections may be made to this interpretation, even supposing Antiochus be allowed to have been a type of Antichrist.—'A horn of a beast is never taken for a single person: it 'always signifies a new kingdom; and the kingdom of 'Antiochus was an old one. Antiochus reigned over one 'of the four horns; and the little horn was a fifth, under 'its proper kings. This horn was at first a little one, and 'waxed exceeding great; but so did not Antiochus. It is 'described great above all the former horns; and so was 'not Antiochus. His kingdom on the contrary was weak, 'and tributary to the Romans; and he did not enlarge it. 'The horn was "a king of fierce countenance, and de'stroyed wonderfully, and prospered and practised:"—'but Antiochus was frighted out of Egypt by a mere mes'sage of the Romans, and afterwards routed and baffled by 'the Jews. The horn was mighty by another's power; 'Antiochus acted by his own. The horn cast down the 'sanctuary to the ground; and so did not Antiochus, he 'left it standing. The sanctuary and host were trampled 'under foot two thousand and three hundred days, (14;) 'and in Daniel's prophecies days are put for years; but 'the profanation of the temple in the reign of Antiochus 'did not last so many natural days. These were to last to 'the end of the indignation against the Jews: and this 'indignation is not yet at an end. They were to last till 'the sanctuary which should be cast down should be 'cleansed; and the sanctuary is not yet cleansed.' (Sir Is. Newton.) Antiochus's 'kingdom was nothing more 'than a continuation of one of the four kingdoms; and 'cannot possibly be considered as a fifth kingdom spring'ing up among the four.' When he stood up, "the "transgressors of the Jewish nation were not come to the "full." 'The holy city was inhabited with all peace; 'and the laws were kept very well; because of the godli'ness of Onias the high-priest, and his hatred of wick'edness.' (2 Mac. iii. 1.) (Bp. Newton.) These and other expositors therefore suppose this little horn, coming forth from one of the former horns, to mean the empire of the Romans, from the time when they had got footing in Greece and Macedonia; which formed one horn of the goat. They then entered on that stage, on which these events were to take place. At first they seemed to have little power within the regions which Alexander had governed; yet that increased exceedingly, by the forces brought from Rome and Italy: and as these formed no part of this goat, the horn grew strong, not by its own power. It is well known how the Romans, (from that time, when they got footing within one of the horns of the goat, and succeeded to the dominions meant by that horn,) extended their conquest eastward into Asia, and through almost all the regions conquered by Alexander; at length conquering Judea and Egypt, as well as other southern regions in Africa. This was in the latter times of the Macedonian kingdom, and terminated in its utter subversion: and the Jews had more entirely filled up their measure of transgression before their grievous sufferings by the Romans, than when Antiochus began to oppress them. Antiochus was ferocious, but he was far from being remarkable for courage: but no people were ever so renowned for this quality as the Romans, or laid their schemes of universal empire in such deep and sound policy, or waxed great as they did. The calamities brought on the Jews by Antiochus were slight and transient, compared with those which they at length endured from the Romans: when Jerusalem was besieged, and taken with most tremendous slaughter; when their whole civil and religious constitution was subverted and destroyed; when the whole of that people were treated with the most cruel contempt; when the city and temple were utterly destroyed, their ritual worship finally terminated, and their poor remains dispersed, as slaves and vagabonds, throughout the earth. And after these events had begun to take place, the Roman emperors, when at the summit of their greatness, became terrible persecutors of the Christian Church, putting to death many of the brightest ornaments of the Gospel, especially several of the apostles of Christ. Yea, they "mag"nified themselves against this Prince of the host," this King of kings; both as Pilate the Roman governor ordered his crucifixion, and as they persecuted his followers for three centuries. And after the emperors became Christians, the civil authority of Rome was gradually weakened, and the empire began to be divided: and then the church and bishop of that city arose to great dominion, by power given from others; and they have proved "rulers of fierce "countenance, and understanding dark sentences;" being ever notorious for savage cruelty, and dark machinations against their opposers. By craftily engaging the princes of their communion to fight their battles, and destroy heretics, (as they call them,) and by a succession of most insidious schemes, they "have cast down the truth to the "ground, and practised, and prospered." Their professed friendship, peace, or alliance, has often proved more destructive than their open enmity; as they have not scrupled to violate the most sacred engagements, and to massacre and murder, in defiance of oaths, covenants, and safe conducts. Thus have they stood up, and "magnified themselves against the Prince of the host;" they have desolated the sanctuary of God, put a stop to the pure administration of his ordinances, and cast down his truth to the ground. But in due time this power will be broken without hand, by the immediate judgment of God. The expression, that the vision was to be shut up, for it should be for many days, leads our thoughts to later times than those of Antiochus Epiphanes, whose persecutions commenced about three hundred and eighty years after Daniel had his vision: and to more continued oppressions than those which he occasioned, which were as nothing, compared with what both Jews and Christians have experienced from Rome, Pagan and Antichristian. As Rome imperial cast down the city of Jerusalem and the temple to the ground, to be trodden under-foot of the Gentiles; so Rome papal hath cast down, and trampled upon the truths, ordinances, and people of Christ, more than any other power ever did. Indeed Rome has hitherto been the grand enemy to Christ and true Christianity, under whatever form that enmity hath been exercised: and the prophecy will not be wholly accomplished, till that Antichristian power shall be finally destroyed.

V. 13, 14. 'The word rendered here "certain saint," 'is translated in the margin, "the numberer of secrets," 'or, "the wonderful numberer," 'and must mean a 'person of extraordinary rank, as being able to unfold those 'secrets which were hid from angels; and is therefore 'justly supposed to mean the Son of God, called the 'WONDERFUL COUNSELLOR, as being acquainted with 'all God's purposes and designs, (John i. 18.) The words 'may be rendered, "For how long a time shall the vision "last, the daily sacrifice be taken away, and the transgression of desolation continue." 'This computation of 'time, in its obvious sense, contains something more than 'six years and four months, reckoning three hundred and 'sixty days to a year: and, if we explain it with relation 'to the persecution set on foot by Antiochus, we must 'date it, not from the height of the persecution, when the 'daily sacrifice was actually taken away; for that continued but just three years, (1 Mac. i. 54. iv. 52;) but—'from the rise of those transgressions which occasioned 'the desolation.' 'But since it is generally agreed, that 'the persecution of Antiochus was an imperfect repre'sentation of a greater desolation, which Antichrist should 'make in the Church: (Compare 13. with xii. 11:) it is 'the opinion of some learned men, that these two thou'sand three hundred days are a line of time, that is to be 'extended to the end of the times of Antichrist; taking 'each day for a year.' (Lowth.) 'The difficulty, or 'impossibility rather, of making these two thousand three 'hundred years accord with the times of Antiochus, I 'suppose, obliged the ancients to consider Antiochus as 'the type of Antichrist.' 'The question was asked, not 'only how long the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, 'and the transgression of desolation continue, but also 'how long the vision shall last? So the answer is to be 'understood; and these days the whole time from the be'ginning of the vision to the cleansing of the sanctuary.' '—These days, or years, I conceive,—are to be computed 'from the vision of the he-goat, or Alexander's invading 'Asia, before Christ 334. Two thousand three hundred 'years from that time will draw towards the conclusion of 'the sixth millennium of the world; and about that period, 'an old tradition, which was current before our Saviour's 'time, and was probably founded on the prophecies, great 'changes and revolutions are to be expected; and parti'cularly as Rabbi Abraham Sebah saith, Rome is to be 'overthrown, and the Jews restored.' (Bp. Newton,)—Some difficulty is found, in determining the precise time from which to date these two thousand three hundred years: and the case is the same, in respect of the thousand two hundred and sixty years, in different ways repeatedly stated to be the term of the desolations or captivity of the Church, both by Daniel and St. John. But nearly a thousand years must be allowed, as intervening between the former and the latter: the two thousand three hundred days, or years, may be supposed to have distinct dates, both for commencement and termination, according to the several steps, by which the predicted events had their beginning, and will at length come to an end. Thus it was with the Babylonish captivity, and the event alone, it is probable, will clear up all the difficulties, in which these calculations must of course be previously involved. It may perhaps be worthy of notice, that it is now about two thousand three hundred and fifty-eight years since Daniel had this vision; and no doubt the end of the two thousand and three hundred days, or years, is not very distant. The marginal references show, that the words rendered "the "transgression of desolation," are referred in the New Testament to events which occurred long after the persecution of Antiochus; and especially to the siege and destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans.

17 So he came near where I stood: and when he came, [p] I was afraid, and fell upon my face: but he said unto me, [q] Understand, O son of man: for [r] at the time of the end shall be the vision.

18 Now as he was speaking with me, [s] I was in a deep sleep on my face toward the ground: but [t] he touched me, and [*] set me upright.

‡ Heb. people of the holy ones.

V. 15—19. We may suppose, that the eternal Son of God stood before the prophet, in the appearance of a man, and with a human voice called unto the angel Gabriel, to explain the vision to him. 'The power to command the 'angel showed it was God.' But the glory of what he saw, and the overpowering influences of the prophetic Spirit, filled Daniel with terror and astonishment: so that he fell on his face, and sunk into a deep sleep; until he was awoke, and raised up, and made to know what would come upon his people, in the last end of the indignation, and about the time appointed for the termination of it.—But in what sense could Antiochus's persecutions be called the last end of the indignation; seeing the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans was to follow, and all the calamities of the Jews to this day? If we understand it of the evils brought on both Jews and Christians by Rome: we shall then see, what is to be the last end of God's indignation against his Church; and when this expires, his people will have peace and prosperity to the end of the world. The phrase here used, "the time of the end," also constrains the interpreter to look forward far beyond the days of Antiochus. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 22. 'Four kingdoms shall be set up by Alexander's 'generals, who shall be of the same nation with him, al- 'though not of his posterity; nor shall they have that power 'or extent of dominion which he possessed.' (Lowth.)

V. 23, 24. (9—12.) 'Greece was the chief province 'of this empire, from whence it had its original and 'name.' (Javan 21. Heb. whence Ionia, Marg. Ref.) 'The bringing this country into subjection to the Roman 'power was a manifest indication of the declension of the 'third monarchy, and the advancement of the fourth.—'This was brought to pass, when Æmilius, the Roman 'Consul, vanquished Perseus king of Macedon, and there- 'by brought all Greece under the power of the Romans; about the time when Antiochus set up "the abomina- "tion of desolation," 'in the temple at Jerusalem.' (Lowth.) 'This kingdom, by the victory of the Romans 'over Perseus, ceased to be one of the four horns of the 'goat, and became a dominion of a new sort; not a horn 'of the fourth beast, for Macedonia belonged to the body 'of the third; but a horn of the goat, which grew 'mighty, not by his own power; a horn which grew 'potent by the power of the Romans.' (Sir Is. Newton.) —'When the Romans first got footing in Greece, then 'they became a horn of the goat: and their actions 'within the dominions of the goat, and not their affairs 'in the western empire, are the principal subjects of this 'prophecy; particularly their great persecution and op- 'pression of the people of God; which renders it pro- 'bable, that the appellation of "the little horn" 'might 'be given them for the same reason, that the great perse- 'cutor and oppressor of the saints in the western Church 'is also called "the little horn." (Bp. Newton.) The Romans stood up in the latter part of the kingdom of the he-goat; for they saw the end of all the four kingdoms represented by his four horns. The transgressions of the Jews also were, in their days, come to the full; and the Romans were the instruments of Providence in bringing wrath to the uttermost on that people. 'The Romans 'were represented in the former vision, by 'a beast 'dreadful and terrible;' 'they are here denominated "a "king of fierce countenance. Understanding dark sen- "tences" 'in Syriac is translated "skilful of ruling," 'and in the Arabic, "skilful of disputations." 'We 'may suppose the meaning to be, that this should be a 'politic and artful, as well as a formidable power, which 'is not so properly the character of Antiochus as of the 'Romans.' 'It was not by the malice of the Jews, but by 'the authority of the Romans, that the Messiah, (the 'Prince of princes,) was put to death: and he suffered 'the punishment of Roman malefactors and slaves. In- 'deed, it is very worthy our most serious consideration, 'whether this part of the prophecy be not a sketch of the '—sufferings of the Christian, as well as of the Jewish 'Church. Nothing is more usual with the prophets, than 'to describe the religion and worship of later times, by 'metaphors taken from their own religion. The Ro- 'mans, not only crucified our Saviour, but also persecuted 'his apostles for above three centuries: and when at length 'they embraced the Christian religion, they soon corrupted 'it. As the power of the Roman Emperors declined,

[a] that of the Roman pontiffs increased: and may it not [c] with equal truth and justice be said of the latter as of [c] the former, that they cast down the truth to the ground, [c] and practised and prospered? How applicable in this [d] sense is every part of the angel's interpretation! The [e] persecuting power of Rome, whether exercised towards [e] the Jews, or towards the Christians; by the emperors or [e] by the popes, is still meant "the little horn." The tyranny [f] is the same; but as exerted in Greece and in the east, it [e] is the little horn of the he-goat; as exerted in Italy and [e] the west, it is the little horn of the fourth beast.' (Bp. Newton.)—The remarkable coincidence of so many prophecies, in respect of these events, forms a most cogent proof, that this is the grand outline of the genuine interpretation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 26. (Marg. Ref.) No power was ever so crafty and politic, as that "man of sin, whom the Lord will "destroy with the brightness of his coming." (2 Thes. ii. 3—12.) Indeed every character of this little horn more exactly suits papal than pagan Rome; though I apprehend both are predicted; that is, Rome persecuting the Church, from her first obtaining power in the east, till the destruction of the city and the introduction of the millennium.

V. 27. [c] The vision of the two thousand three hundred [c] mornings and evenings mentioned in the fourteenth verse.' (Marg.) (Lowth.)—[c] The "shutting up of the vision," [c] implies that it should not be understood for some time: [c] and we cannot say that it was sufficiently understood, so [c] long as Antiochus Epiphanes was taken for the little [c] horn. The vision being "for many days," must ne[c]cessarily infer a longer term than the calamity under [c] Antiochus, of three years, or three years and a half.—[c] Such a vision could not well be called long to Daniel, [c] who had seen so much longer before.—Two thousand [c] three hundred years,—may properly enough be said to be "for many days." (Bp. Newton.)

V. 27. Daniel's fainting, sickness, and astonishment, at the prospect of the evils which he saw coming on his people and on the Church, are circumstances which favour the supposition, that vastly more durable calamities were apprehended than those under Antiochus; for these bore no proportion to what the Jews had endured from the Chaldeans, and from which they were not at that time delivered. He, however, at length recovered his health and composure, and attended to the business about which the king had employed him: though he had only a very imperfect understanding of this extraordinary vision.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

As the Scriptures were written in the languages of the people to whom they were specially addressed; so ought they to be faithfully translated into the vulgar tongue of every country to which they are sent; that men may have free access to them, and by them be made wise unto eternal salvation. Indeed every thing in religion should be made as plain as possible to the meanest capacities of the most illiterate: and whatever counteracts this intention, savours more of the subtlety of Antichrist, than of the wisdom and simplicity of Christ. No wonder, "when holy men of God spake as they were moved by "the Holy Ghost," that they declared future events as if they had been eye-witnesses of the performance of them. To "this light, that shineth in a dark place, we shall do "well to take heed," until the day of glory dawn in our hearts, and the witness in ourselves establish at once our belief of the truth of the Scriptures, and of our own interest in the blessings therein revealed. The most feeble of the creatures would become formidable enemies, if God were pleased to employ them against us; and it often happens, in providence as well as in grace, that "the first be"come last and the last first." Powerful men commonly employ themselves in pushing down their neighbours, and trampling upon them; they are not willing that any should stand before or escape them; but they desire to do their own will, and become unrivalled in greatness, whatever mischiefs they bring upon others. But such men lay the axe to the root of their own greatness: they multiply enemies along with their successes: and thus others are excited to avenge the cause of the oppressed, and to fulfil God's righteous judgments; even when urged forward by their own impetuous ambition, rapacity, or resentment. Whilst prosperous warriors thus drive furiously, and carry all before them, and millions admire their consummate valour and conduct, or their good fortune; perhaps their enterprises are little better than madness, though rendered successful by Providence, till they have reached their appointed limits, and then in the midst of their career of prosperity they are suddenly removed; and whilst men dispute about the second causes of the disaster, it is plain that the great first Cause of all had no more of his plan for them to execute, and therefore he cut them off, to make room for other instruments. We perceive this clearly by comparing these prophecies with the records of their accomplishment: and we shall see it as evident in the case of others, as in that of Alexander, if we steadily exercise our faith on the word of God, and judge of every event by that rule.

V. 9—14.

CHAP. IX.

Daniel, being assured that the end of the captivity was near, humbles himself in confessing his sins and those of his people, and earnestly prays for the restoration of Jerusalem, 1—19. Gabriel informs him that the city, being rebuilt, shall continue for seventy weeks of years; when the Messiah, being cut off for the sins of his people, and the covenant confirmed with many; the legal sacrifices would be terminated, and desolating judgments overwhelm both the city and nation, 20—27.

stead, to keep the nations in perpetual turmoil, and to drench the earth with the blood of its inhabitants. This is an abstract of the history of mankind: nor have the pleasant lands, where the light of heavenly truth hath most shined, escaped their share of these desolations. They that fill the earth with war are commonly disposed to vex the Church with persecution; and they often do not think themselves mighty in power, till they have declared war against the armies of the living God, and trampled down those who were burning and shining lights on earth, and who shall shine as stars in the kingdom of God for ever. Whether they intend it, or not, yet they magnify themselves against the King of kings, the Prince of the holy army of martyrs, when they persecute his people. They may indeed so far prevail, as to put a stop to the public preaching of the gospel and administration of divine ordinances; they may silence the ministers and trample on the truths and sanctuary of Christ; they may destroy wonderfully the mighty and holy people of God; they may unite fierceness with policy and power, and practise and prosper; yet their successes will have an appointed period: when the hypocrites are detected, or cut off, and the believers are sufficiently proved and purified, or taken home, they will be broken without hand. Many, that for a time have had power given them for these purposes, have thus run their course, and have perished miserably in their sins. The two thousand and three hundred days will soon expire, when every enemy shall be destroyed, and the sanctuary be cleansed; when the time of the indignation shall come to an end, and the Church's tears shall terminate in joy and praise.

V. 15—27.

Whilst some things are exceedingly plain in these prophecies, for our conviction, let us remember that difficulties are left in others, among other reasons, to be a touchstone of our modesty and sincerity. If we humbly desire to understand the meaning of them, our great Prophet will lead us into it as far as is good for us: but we may be thankful to be taught by the instrumentality of men, and by the silent teaching of the Holy Spirit: for the glory even of angels, if they were to appear to us sinful worms of the earth, would scarcely be supportable, and the best of us should need much encouragement to endure their visible presence, or to hear their kindest words; at so great a distance hath sin placed us from the world of spirits, to which otherwise we should have been most nearly allied! But amidst all our doubts and discouragements, on our own account, or that of the Gospel, we may, if true believers, look forward with a cheerful hope of a happy event; and we should thus endeavour to compose our minds for attending on the business, to which we are severally appointed, in the Church and in the world.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1. Darius. 'This is the same 'person who is called Cyaxares the son of Astyages by 'the heathen historians. Astyages had the name of Aha- 'suerus among the Jews, as appears by a passage in Tobit, '(xiv. 15.) where the taking of Nineveh is ascribed to 'Nebuchadanosor and Assuerus, who were the same with 'Nabupollazar, Nebuchadnezzar's father, and Astyages.' (Lowth.)

V. 2, 3. It is probable that Daniel received the answer to his prayer, which is recorded in this chapter, a short time before he was cast into the den of lions; and it was an excellent introduction to that trial of his faith and piety. —He learned from the books of the prophets, especially from the writings of Jeremiah, that the desolations of Jerusalem would continue seventy years, which he understood were drawing to a conclusion. (Marg. Ref.) 'We 'may observe from hence, that the prophets studied the 'writings of those prophets who were before them, for 'the more perfect understanding of the times when their 'prophecies were to be fulfilled.' (Lowth.) These seventy years were dated from the latter end of the third, or beginning of the fourth year of Jehoiakim, when Daniel was carried captive, and this was the sixty-ninth of them. —The prophet was much above eighty years of age at this time, and chief President of the whole kingdom: yet he diligently set himself to seek from God, by prayer and fasting, with every token of sorrow, humiliation, and self-denial, the performance of his promised mercy to his afflicted people, and his future blessings upon them. He had his regular hours of prayer three times a day, and we may be sure that he did not forget the people on those occasions; yet he regarded it as a duty incumbent on him to set apart stated seasons for mortification and devotion, in the distressed state of his people and the church of God! (Marg. Ref.)

4 And I prayed unto the LORD my God, and [g] made my confession, and said, O Lord, [h] the great and dreadful God, keeping the covenant and mercy to them that love him, and to them that keep his commandments;

5 We [i] have sinned, and have committed iniquity, and have done wickedly, and have rebelled, even by [k] departing from thy precepts, and from thy judgments:

6 Neither [l] have we hearkened unto thy servants the prophets, which spake in thy name to [m] our kings, our princes, and our fathers, and to all the people of the land.

7 O Lord, [n] righteousness * belongeth unto thee, but [o] unto us confusion of faces, as at this day; to the men of Judah, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and unto all Israel, that are [p] near, and that are far off, through all the countries whither thou hast driven them, because of their trespass that they have trespassed against thee.

8 O Lord, [q] to us belongeth confusion of face; to our kings, to our princes, and to our fathers; [r] because we have sinned against thee.

9 To [s] the LORD our God belong mercies and forgivenesses, [t] though we have rebelled against him;

10 Neither have we obeyed the voice of the LORD our God, to walk in his laws, [u] which he set before us by his servants the prophets.

11 Yea, [x] all Israel have transgressed thy law, even by departing, that they might not obey thy voice; therefore [y] the curse is poured upon us, and the oath that is written in the law of Moses the servant of God, because we have sinned against him.

12 And he hath [z] confirmed his words, which he spake against us, and against [a] our judges that judged us, by bringing upon us a great evil: for [b] under the whole heaven hath not been done, as hath been done upon Jerusalem.

13 As [c] it is written in the law of Moses, all this evil is come upon us: [d] yet † made we not our prayer before the LORD our God, [e] that we might turn from our iniquities, and understand thy truth.

V. 4. We may suppose that Daniel enlarged very much on these particulars, in his copious supplications, of which he hath given us a compendium. In these he first confessed the sins of himself and his people, and professed his belief of the terrible greatness and power of Israel's God, and his covenanted mercy and favour to those who loved him and kept his commandments; for others were only nominal Israelites, who had forfeited their privileges by their crimes, and by impenitence and unbelief. (Marg. Ref.) 'The better men are, the greater is the 'sense of their guilt, and the deeper their humiliation.' (Lowth.)

V. 5, 6. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7—10. 'He showeth, that whensoever God punish-'eth, he doeth it for just cause: and thus the godly never 'accuse him of rigour, as the wicked do; but acknowledge 'that in themselves there is just cause why he should so 'entreat them.' But Daniel also recollected, that abundant mercies and forgivenesses, as well as perfect justice, belonged to God: so that even the rebellious might hope in him, when brought to a sense of their guilt and danger.—The kings of Judah and Israel were dead, and there were at that time no inhabitants of Judah or Jerusalem; but the prophet considers not only the generation of Israel then living, but also the several orders of men, who, in former ages, had provoked God to pour out vengeance on the nation. He shows that the whole blame lay on them, and that they had all acted a most shameful part. Some had been covered with confusion of face, as true penitents, and the rest would inherit everlasting shame and contempt, (xii. 2. Marg. Ref.)

Set before us, &c. Or, "Placed before our faces." The plain instructions and pressing exhortations of the prophets are thus described, in order to aggravate the guilt of those who, notwithstanding, persisted in rebellion.

V. 11. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. (Marg. Ref.) The destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the condition of the Jews during almost eighteen centuries, have far more exceeded all the miseries of the Babylonish captivity, than those miseries exceeded the judgments inflicted on other nations: and is it not then evident, that the guilt of crucifying the Messiah, and rejecting his Gospel, was immensely more atrocious, than all their previous transgressions? (Note, 25—27.)

V. 13. As it, &c. 'A devout acknowledgment of 'God's justice, in making his judgments exactly fulfil 'the threatenings denounced many ages ago by Moses.' (Lowth.) Thus every succeeding part of the sacred writings attests and proves the divine authority of those parts which preceded. The history relates the fulfilment of former predictions; and then new prophecies are added, which future events accomplish. (Is. xlii. 9.)

Yet, &c. Few, comparatively, of the Jews humbly prayed for deliverance from their troubles, as expecting it from the power and mercy of God: and some, who prayed to him for help in affliction, did not seek for his converting grace, or desire to be turned from all their iniquities, and to understand his truth and will.

V. 14. Watched, &c. The Jews had watched for opportunities of committing wickedness; and therefore the Lord watched his opportunity of executing deserved punishment upon them: that is, he did at the proper time and in the most effectual manner, in order to make known the glory of his holy name.

V. 16. Thy righteousness. The Lord had glorified his righteousness in punishing the people for their sins, but his justice would also consist with the exercise of mercy towards them: and as he had promised to deliver and restore them, it was become in some sense an act of righteousness to do it; the honour of his word and of his holy name required it, and it involved in it all the interests of truth and righteousness on earth. 'According to all thy 'merciful promises and the performance of them.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17. Lord's, &c. That is, either for his own name's sake, and not for their sake; (Ez. xxxvi. 22. 31.) or for the sake of Christ the Lord, as most Christian interpreters have understood it. 'For the sake of the Messiah, '(26,) known by the title of the Lord among the Jews.' (Ps. cx. 1.) 'All God's promises are fulfilled in and for 'the sake of Christ.' (2 Cor. i. 20.) (Lowth.) Jerusalem must be rebuilt and the Jews restored, in order to the performance of the promises concerning the Lord Christ.

V. 18. We do not, &c. 'Declaring that the godly flee 'only unto God's mercies, and renounce their own works, 'when they seek for remission of their sins.'

V. 19. 'He could not content himself with any ve'hemency of words; for he was so led with fervent zeal; 'considering God's promise made to the city, in respect 'of the Church, and for the advancement of his glory.'—Perhaps Daniel feared lest the promised blessing should be delayed, through the neglect of the people; supposing that but few of them earnestly prayed for it. (Jer. xxix. 12, 13. Ez. xxxvi. 37.)

V. 20. My sin, &c. Daniel's character stands so fair in Scripture, for wisdom and piety, from early youth to extreme old age, that we should scarcely have known that he was a sinner if he had not told us so: yet doubtless he was proportionably humbled before God for his sins of heart and life; and considered the continued calamities of the nation as a chastisement of his offences, as well as those of his countrymen.

V. 21—23. Whilst Daniel was thus humbling himself before God, and earnestly pleading in behalf of his people and Jerusalem, and for blessings on the Church of God; the angel Gabriel, (called here the man, because he appeared in human form,) whom he had seen in a former vision, (viii. 16) came flying swiftly, as one in haste, and earnest to answer his prayers and relieve his anxiety. He touched Daniel about the time of the evening oblation, the hour when it had been used to be offered; or about three o'clock in the afternoon; (about which hour Christ our Sacrifice expired.) Probably Daniel had spent all the former part of the day in fasting, and prayer, and religious exercises, and was about to conclude for the present: but whilst he was thus earnestly engaged, the angel touched him, and excited his attention; informing him that he was commissioned to instruct him in the most important matters, connected with the subject of his prayers: for he had no sooner begun to pray, than the Lord commanded him to come to him; as he was a man greatly beloved, a special favourite of heaven, even one in whom the Lord greatly delighted. Therefore he would understand the plan of Providence, and be enabled to consider the vision in a satisfactory manner. It is probable that Daniel had prayed not only for the restoration of the Jews from captivity, and the rebuilding of the city and temple; but also that they might be preserved from those sins which had brought the calamities upon them; for the continuance of God's favour to them; and for all the blessings which were expected from the coming of the promised Messiah: and the following vision was an answer to these prayers and desires of his heart. 'Learned men have observed a near 'affinity between the prophecy of Daniel and the Revela-'tion of St. John: and we may take notice, that much the 'same title is given to both.' Daniel is styled "a man "greatly beloved; and John, "the disciple whom Jesus "loved." (John xxi. 20—24.) (Lowth.)

V. 24. We have in this and the following verses one of the most undeniable prophecies of Christ, and of his coming and salvation, that is found in the whole Old Testament: and they contain the true reason why the Jews hesitate to call Daniel a prophet; as this prediction demonstrates that Jesus was the promised Messiah, and that they are guilty of the most obstinate unbelief, in expecting another Messiah so many centuries after the time fixed for his coming, and after the actual accomplishment of the other parts of the same prophecy. There are, however, difficulties in expounding the passage, which have occasioned a variety of opinions among commentators, who all agree in the great outlines. It is universally allowed, that the seventy weeks, here mentioned, mean seventy weeks of years, or what would be equivalent to seventy returns of the sabbatical year; that is, four hundred and ninety years. This period was determined, or decided on; and during this term the Jews would enjoy the peculiar privileges of God's people; and Jerusalem, being rebuilded, would retain the name of the holy city: but about the expiration of these years, a sacrifice would be offered, making effectual atonement for sin, superseding the necessity of the repeated legal sacrifices and sin-offerings; as well as for the reconciliation and sanctification of the true people of God: an everlasting righteousness would also be introduced, for the complete justification of every believer; the time allotted for the law and the prophets would expire; the kingdom of God would be preached; and all the visions and prophecies of the Scriptures concerning Christ would receive their accomplishment, in this Holy One of God being anointed by the Holy Ghost, and in all respects perfected and exalted as the Messiah. —The marginal readings vary, in some respects, from the translation: but they do not appear materially to affect the meaning. The word rendered prophecy, is prophet: and may be understood of Christ, the great Prophet of the Church, being openly preached to mankind in this character. Most Holy, is literally "Holy of holies," 'an 'expression which usually signifies the inner sanctuary; 'and it is very properly applied to the Messiah, who was 'greater than the temple, (Matt. xii. 6;) because in him "dwelt the fulness of the Godhead," (Col. ii. 9;) 'where-'upon he calls his body "the temple." (John ii. 21.) (Lowth.)

V. 25—27. The former verse gives a general view of the subject, but these are more particular. The prophet was called on to observe and understand, that "from the "going forth of the commandment to restore Jerusalem, "unto the Messiah, would be seven weeks, and sixty-"two weeks;" during the seven weeks the streets and walls of the city would be rebuilded, amidst much oppo-

CHAP. X.

Daniel, after long mourning and fasting, has a vision, the glory of which overpowers him, 1—9. An angel comforts and strengthens him; and noticing the sition, and in very turbulent times: and after the expiration of the sixty-two weeks, (making sixty-nine in all,) or in the seventieth week, the Messiah would be cut off, by a violent death, but not for any offence of his own: (Marg. Ref.) and then the people of a prince that should come would destroy both Jerusalem and the temple, and bear down all before them like a deluge of waters; for unto the end of that war desolations of the most dreadful kind were determined upon. But before this, the Messiah, ("the Messenger of the Covenant," who was to be "given as a Covenant to the people,") would "confirm "the Covenant with many for one week:" the last week of the seventy, whether ending at the death of Christ, as some compute, and extending to two or three years after that event. For, by his own personal ministry, and afterwards by that of his apostles, multitudes of the Jews would accede to the new covenant mediated by him, and way would be made for the calling of the Gentiles also. And his sacrifice of himself, offered during this week, (perhaps towards the middle of it,) would virtually terminate the Mosaic dispensation, and vacate the ceremonial law: so that all other sacrifices and oblations would thenceforth be in every respect inefficacious. (Heb. x. 26.) But the Jewish nation in general, adhering to these sacrifices, and scornfully rejecting that of the Messiah, would in consequence see the idolatrous standards of hostile invaders, (which they justly counted an abomination,) appear in the land and about Jerusalem; as a token of the desolations which were about to overspread the whole city and country, and to pursue the devoted inhabitants, till all the vengeance which had been determined and predicted had been poured out upon them: and by the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, the sacrifices there offered would actually be caused to cease. This seems a general outline of the events here foretold; and historical records sufficiently show its general accomplishment, though some difficulty in subordinate matters should still remain.—'There are four edicts, recorded in Scripture, to which 'these words, ("the going forth of the commandment, "&c.") 'may seem applicable: viz. the edict in the first 'year of Cyrus, (Ezra i. 1;) in the second of Darius, '(Ezra vi. 1. Hag. i. 1;) in the seventh of Artax-'erxes, (Ezra vii. 7;) and in the twentieth, (Neh. i. ii.) '—There are some things in the prediction which, when 'duly adverted to, give good ground for passing by the 'two first edicts. And as to the two last, it has been well 'observed, that Christ's death happened seventy weeks 'of solar years after one of them, and as many weeks of 'lunar years after the other. The two first edicts speak 'only about the rebuilding of the temple,—without one 'word about rebuilding the city: whereas the prediction 'speaks about an edict for rebuilding the city and the 'walls and streets of it, without one word about rebuild-'ing the temple; though in foretelling the second destruc-'tion of the city, that of the temple is also mentioned.—'But the third edict, that of the seventh of Artaxerxes, 'though it does not contain the very expressions of Daniel's 'prediction, yet it contains things to which these ex-'pressions are applicable. Sir Isaac Newton justly ob-'serves, that the dispersed Jews became a people and a 'city, when they returned into a body politic; and that 'was in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus; 'when Ezra, by the king's commission, erected magis-'trates all over the land, to govern the people according to 'the law of God and of the king: under Ezra they first 'became a polity or city by a government of their own.—'But there is another character, which is perhaps yet 'more decisive. According to the prediction, the edict 'must be only seven weeks before completing the building 'of the city: for one and the same event, viz. the appear-'ance of the Messiah, which is placed only sixty-two 'weeks after the building, is placed only sixty-nine after 'the edict: which demonstrates, that the distance between 'the edict and the building could be no more than seven 'weeks. Now the two first edicts were made long before; 'for in the twentieth of Artaxerxes, (above eighty years 'after the latest of those edicts,) it was told Nehemiah, that 'the wall was broken down, the gates burnt with fire, 'and the place of his father's sepulchres lay waste.' (Maclaurin.) The date of the going forth of the decree to restore and rebuild Jerusalem cannot therefore be reckoned from the time of Cyrus's decree, or that of Darius. It is generally fixed to the commission granted to Ezra by Artaxerxes in the seventh year of his reign; though some prefer the commission granted to Nehemiah by the same prince, in his twentieth year, and so reckon the years by the shorter computation. But the former seems more satisfactory, and is only objected to, because Nehemiah's commission especially related to the rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem; whereas Ezra's was of a more general nature. But the expressions here used may be understood figuratively, of re-settling the whole Jewish constitution in Church and state, which Ezra began and Nehemiah carried on or finished; as well as of rebuilding and fortifying the city. (Marg. Ref.) The most eminent chronologers compute it to have been nearly four hundred and ninety years, from the commission granted to Ezra to the death of Christ; and some contend that it was so with the greatest exactness. This period was divided into three subordinate ones. During seven weeks, or forty-nine years, the street and wall, or rampart, were to be builded in troublous times. This takes in the space that intervened between the granting of Ezra's commission and the completion of Nehemiah's work, as recorded in the last chapter of his book, and which contains the last history in the Old Testament, or perhaps some time longer. From the return of the Jews, in virtue of Cyrus's decree, till the days of Artaxerxes Longimanus, (though the temple had been rebuilded, and some parts of the city;) the affairs of the Jews continued in great disorder, both as to the state of the city, and the regulation of their civil and religious concerns. From Ezra's commission, however, they began to assume a more promising aspect: and notwithstanding the troubles excited by various enemies, matters were at length brought into better order, both as to the temple and its worship, and as to the police and defence of the city; and the state was guarded with wholesome laws impartially executed. These things were accomplished in very troublesome times, as the histories of Ezra and Nehemiah show: but afterwards the nation became populous and powerful, and Jerusalem very strong and almost impregnable. These were the events that occurred in the first seven weeks: and from the expiration of that term to the beginning of the Gospel by the ministry of John the Baptist, as some compute, or to that of our Lord, was four hundred and thirty-four years, or sixty-two weeks: and the last week, or seven years, is allotted to the ministry of John and of Christ himself, until his crucifixion: for he was to be cut off after the seven and the sixty-two weeks, or in the seventieth week: but as it is said, that in the midst or in the half part of the week he would cause the sacrifice to cease; some conclude, that the last week extended beyond his crucifixion, to the time when the Gospel began to be preached to the Gentiles also. We cannot, however, be absolutely certain in respect of minute calculations: but whether before, or just after, the death of Christ, every thing was done within this last week, or seven years, which was requisite for introducing the Gospel-dispensation, for confirming the new covenant of grace, and for the calling of multitudes to partake of its blessings. The legal sacrifices then lost their obligation and efficacy; the condemnation of the Jewish nation was denounced and ratified by Christ himself; and preparation was soon made for its execution, though it was not fully completed till about forty years afterwards: these intermediate years being like the time which intervenes between the condemnation and the execution of a malefactor. Those insurrections, however, soon began, which induced the Romans to make war upon the Jews. Then their armies under Vespasian and Titus erected their idolatrous standards in the holy land, and surrounded Jerusalem; the city was besieged, taken, and desolated, and left to be trodden down by the Gentiles; immense multitudes perished miserably; the temple was destroyed by the soldiers, contrary to the orders of the general: the remnant of the Jews were dispersed through all nations; and those judgments were poured as an irresistible deluge on that people, which have continued to this day. Thus the general interpretation is plain, notwithstanding some difficulties. 'It is very useful to observe, that (supposing all these things to be real causes 'of some kind of obscurity; namely, of that obscurity 'which is impenetrable by superficial attention, but is 'consistent with convincing evidence upon due search;)— 'the veil of apparent obscurity, which distinguishes pro- 'phecy from history, is a proof of wise contrivance;— 'seeing, what on first view increases the obscurity, on due 'inquiry, increases the evidence, and determines the mean- 'ing of the prediction.' (Maclaurin.) Indeed, inattention to the words of the prophecy itself has been the chief cause of those differences of opinion which prevail in explaining it; it contains internal characters, which carefully noted fix the time of its accomplishment very satisfactorily. It is, however, undeniable, that Daniel foretold, that the Messiah would come within less than five hundred years from a decree granted for rebuilding Jerusalem; he showed that he would be put to death, by a legal sentence, (for so the word implies;) and he expressly predicted, that, in consequence, Jerusalem and the temple would be desolated, and the nation of the Jews exposed to tremendous punishments, of which no termination is mentioned. Within that time, Jesus of Nazareth appeared: he answered in every respect to the description given of him by all the prophets; he was put to death as a deceiver; yet vast multitudes became his disciples, and Christianity gained a permanent establishment. After a time Jerusalem and the temple were destroyed; and the state of the Jews to this day is a striking comment on this prediction. How can it then be denied, that Daniel spake by divine inspiration? or that Jesus is the promised Messiah? Both these important points might be fully demonstrated by this one prophecy, even if it stood single: how much more, when it is only one star, so to speak, in a resplendent constellation; or one among a vast number of predictions, all of which combine with united evidence to demonstrate the same grand truths! (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—19.

They who are most eminent in wisdom and piety, and favoured with most frequent communications from heaven, will pay the greatest reverence to the written word of God: and only spiritual pride or enthusiasm render men regardless of this sacred standard, because of superior knowledge or supposed new revelations; for the genuine spirit of prophecy would have a contrary effect. The most exalted in rank, and they that are most occupied in important employments, should spare time for the study of the Scriptures and prayer. The promises of God are intended to encourage our petitions for their accomplishment. No personal ease or prosperity can render the believer regardless of the desolations, or indifferent about the prosperity, of Zion: and no constancy in stated exercises of devotion, should prevent us from sometimes setting apart extraordinary seasons for prayer and fasting; that we may more deeply humble ourselves before God for our sins and those of our people; and with more earnest and undivided attention seek his blessing on our undertakings and on his cause. Nor will the aged believer, if growing in grace and not prevented by bodily infirmities, wish to excuse himself from these self-denying and humiliating duties.— Our addresses to the Lord our God should always be attended with humble confessions of our own unworthiness, and reverential awe of his holy, great, and terrible majesty; even whilst we plead before him, as "the God who "keepeth covenant and mercy with his people." Love to him, shown by obeying his commandments, is the proper evidence that we are interested in these blessings; nor can they who live in sin, and are conscious that they have committed iniquity, and done wickedly, and rebelled in departing from his precepts, take comfort from his covenant and mercy; till they repent and seek forgiveness, and have their hearts thus influenced to love and obey him. But such as freely confess their sins, and labour for language to express their sense of the malignity and multitude of their transgressions, give a hopeful evidence that they are prepared for returning peace, and for a gracious answer to all their supplications. No rank or order of men in the community is free from blame, in respect of the accumulation of national guilt: and if kings or princes refuse to hearken to the faithful ministers of God, they render the mercy of God, in thus warning them, an occasion of deeper guilt and condemnation. In all our sufferings we should acknowledge the justice of the Lord, and that he is glorious even in our punishment; and that shame and confusion of face are our portion, as we have sinned away our mercies and exposed ourselves to his severe rebukes. Yet we must not yield to despondency: for "to the Lord "belong mercies, and forgivenesses, though we have "rebelled against him;" nay, his pardoning grace is vaster than all our crimes. He will indeed execute his threatened judgments on guilty nations, and pour out his curse on impenitent sinners, according as it is written in the book of the law: he will thus establish his word, that he hath spoken against the wicked, in bringing a great evil upon them, even far greater than befel Jerusalem: and so long as men neglect prayer, or do not pray to be turned from their iniquities, and to be made to understand the truth of God, he will watch upon the evil to bring it upon them, being "righteous in all his works." Yet he is ever ready to deliver those who humble themselves before him and call upon him, and to exert that power that he so gloriously displayed, when he brought Israel out of Egypt. When we humbly confess our sins, and plead his promises, and beseech him, for the honour of his name and the credit of his cause, to help and deliver us, that Jerusalem may not become a reproach, we may confidently expect in due time an answer of peace: and we never pray more acceptably, than when we are satisfied about our own concerns, and earnestly entreat our God and Father to cause his face to shine on his sanctuary, for the sake of Christ "the Lord our Righteousness;" and when we present our supplications before him, not for our righteousness, but for his great mercies.

V. 20—27.

The fervent and importunate cries of zealous Christians are well pleasing to the Lord: he will forgive, and hearken, and do: whilst they are speaking he is preparing an answer; and all his angels, though invisible, are his ministering spirits to convey blessings to the heirs of salvation. They fly swiftly to execute every one of his commands; but they especially delight in performing kind services to praying souls; who, being accepted in Christ, are "greatly "beloved," in proportion to the degree in which they resemble him and seek his glory. The Lord gives skill and understanding in answer to prayer, and they who well consider his words shall receive instruction, in every thing which concerns them. All blessings bestowed on sinners centre in Christ, and come to them through his all-sufficient atoning sacrifice: and the most eminent believers need frequently to be reminded to look off from forms, and types, and shadows, and outward privileges, unto the anointed Holy One, who was cut off by an ignominious excruciating death, "suffering once for sins, the just for "the unjust, that he might bring us to God." Thus he finished whatever the types prefigured, the prophets foretold, or the justice of God and the honour of the law required, in order to the pardoning and subduing our transgressions, the atoning for our iniquity, our reconciliation to God, our everlasting righteousness and sanctification. Here is the foundation of our hope, our Fountain opened for sin and uncleanness, our Way of access to the throne of grace, and our entrance into heaven. This seals the sum of prophecy, and confirms the covenant with many: and whilst we rejoice in the blessings of salvation, we should remember the groans which the purchase of them cost our Redeemer. But "how shall they escape who "neglect so great salvation?" The desolations of Jerusalem, and the slaughter or long-continued dispersion of the Jews, by the overspreading of abomination; and the pouring out of divine vengeance on the murderers of Christ, not only evince the truth of the Scriptures, but loudly warn others not to copy so fatal an example.—When the Lord commands, the city will be builded, and its prosperity secured, even in turbulent times; and at his word desolations rush in like a flood, from which no outward privileges can defend us: but the streets and walls of the true Jerusalem, which hath been so long building in troublesome times, will at length be completed by the ruin of every adversary; and "peace will be "within her walls, and prosperity within her palaces." Let us pray for this peace of Jerusalem, for they shall prosper that love her.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1. This chapter begins Daniel's last vision, which was about four years after the preceding one. It is continued to the end of the book: and as the things revealed would certainly take place, so the time would be long before they would all be accomplished. To the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, of whom exclusively many interpret the latter part of the vision, was no more than three hundred and seventy years; and Daniel had predicted events vastly more remote: but on another interpretation, which is supported by the highest authorities, and by the most conclusive reasonings, it will appear that many of them are not yet accomplished, and indeed that they look forward almost to the end of time: and thus Daniel himself seems to have understood them. "And he understood "the matter, and obtained knowledge of it by the vision." Thus the concluding words may be literally rendered; he acquired much knowledge of these events, in addition to what he had before, by this vision; though some things still remained obscure to him. (xii. 8.)

V. 2, 3. Daniel had been at this time seventy-three years in captivity; and could not be less than ninety years of age: yet he spent three weeks, in mournfully humbling himself before God. It is probable, that he was much affected at witnessing the backwardness of the Jews, to avail themselves of Cyrus's proclamation; perhaps fearing, lest his example, in serving the king of Persia, should be misunderstood by them. He doubtless would hear from time to time discouraging accounts of the difficulties, which his brethren in Judea had to encounter: and many think, that machinations were then carrying on against them in the Persian court, which might throw still greater obstacles and discouragements in their way. (Notes, Ezra iv.) But, whatever induced him thus to observe so long a season of fasting and prayer, he abstained, during the whole time, from all relishing food, and from wine, subsisting on bread and vegetables, drinking only water, and avoiding the use of those ointments and other indulgences, which his station and time of life seemed to render necessary. (i. 8—16.)—This was very different from those fasts of later ages, in which men indeed abstain from flesh, but eat other delicacies, and drink strong liquors without restraint.

V. 4—9. Part of the time of Daniel's fasting must have coincided with the season appointed for the passover and the feast of unleavened bread: but the passover could not be observed in any other place than Jerusalem; and the distressed state of the nation rendered fasting peculiarly proper at that time. Hiddekel, or Tigris, (Gen. ii. 14,) was near Shusan, where, it is probable, Daniel at that time resided. Whilst he walked on the banks of that river, for contemplation or devotion, with attendants at a distance, he lifted up his eyes and saw one in the form of a man, who could be no other than the Son of God.—'The description St. John gives of Christ, as High Priest 'of the Church, (Rev. i. 12—20,) seems to be taken 'from this place of Daniel; which proves that the person 'here described can be no other than the Son of God, 'which may be further confirmed by comparing the per-'son described here, and xii. 5, 6, with Rev. x. 2—6; 'who is there represented as setting his right foot on the 'sea, and his left upon the land, as Sovereign Lord of 'both elements.' (Lowth.) His priestly garment of linen was an emblem of his purity, and the equity of his administration, and the excellency of his mediatorial work. His girdle, of the finest gold, might denote his faithfulness to his word, and readiness to perform all things which he had undertaken, for his Church: his body like the beryl, might signify his heavenly beauty and excellency: his face as lightning, and his eyes as lamps of fire, might show the terror of his frown, and his discernment and knowledge of all hearts and all events: his arms and feet as polished brass, might imply his glorious power, as engaged to defend and support his people, and to tread down their enemies: and the voice of his words, like the voice of a multitude, might signify the extensive efficacy of his word to save or to destroy. Daniel alone saw the vision of this glorious Person; for his attendants were so alarmed, that they fled to hide themselves; and even he was so overwhelmed by it, as to be deprived of strength and courage; and his countenance was changed to a pallid and ghastly hue, like that of a corpse. Yet was he not wholly incapacitated for hearing the words of the Lord; though he lay prostrate on the ground in humble adoration of his glorious majesty, his senses and faculties being closed from all other objects, as in a deep sleep. V. 10—14. Whilst Daniel lay prostrate, a hand touched him: this seems to have been a created angel, (and not the Son of God:) and the prophet was lifted upon his knees and hands, that he might attend to the vision. The angel encouraged him as before, (ix. 23,) by assuring him, that he was peculiarly dear to the Lord; and called on him to understand or attend to what he had to speak, and to stand up for that purpose, as he was sent to give him important information. Thus excited, Daniel arose, and stood trembling; and the angel proceeded to encourage him to lay aside his terrors, for which he had no cause: for since the first day that he set his heart to understand the causes of his people's calamities, and what would be the event of them, and to chasten, or rather humble, himself by fasting and mortification, his prayers were heard, and the angel was now come to him on that account. But he had been employed, during the three weeks of Daniel's fasting and prayer, in warding off the mischief, that was rising against his people in the Persian court. The prince of the kingdom of Persia cannot mean Cyrus, who was friendly to the Jews: but his son Cambyses, who managed affairs in his father's absence upon some expedition, and who was set against the Jews by their enemies, might be intended; and the angel had been so long watching over his designs, in order to defeat them. But many think an evil angel was meant, who presided under "the god of this world," over that department, to watch his opportunity of doing mischief to the Church. Some indeed explain it, of the guardian-angel, intrusted with the care of Persia: but it is palpably absurd to suppose one holy angel set to oppose another holy angel: and indeed the interpretation, which introduces presiding angels, holy, or unholy, seems to have little scriptural ground to rest on. The angel, however, who spake to Daniel, was detained all this time, to defeat the machinations of the enemies of Israel; and yet could not have prevailed, but that Michael, one of the chief princes, (whom many think to denote Christ,) came to his assistance, (Marg. Ref.) while employed to watch the measures of the Persian rulers: but he was at that time sent to make known to Daniel what would befal his people in future ages and in the latter days.

V. 15—19. This angel, that was helped by Michael, appeared so glorious to Daniel, that he was astonished and struck dumb by what he saw and heard: but one like to a man touched his lips, and then he was enabled to speak; and he complained, that, instead of deriving comfort from the vision, his sorrows were renewed by it, and he was utterly overcome; for how could the poor servant endure to speak with his glorious Lord? so that it was no wonder that he was left fainting and breathless. Again therefore one touched him, in appearance as a man; and communicated strength to him: and then the prophet was enabled to hear the words which he spake to him.

How can, &c. "How can the servant of this my "Lord talk with that my Lord?" 'that is, with so 'majestic a person, at whose sight I was perfectly con-'founded.' (Lowth.) This supposes, at least with probability, that the angel mentioned in the preceding verses is here meant; not that glorious Person before described, but an angel deputed by him.

O man, &c. 'Thou needest not be under such terrible 'apprehensions, as if this vision did portend thee some 'mischief: for it is a peculiar token of God's favour to 'thee.' (Lowth.)

V. 20, 21. The angel next inquired whether Daniel well understood for what purpose he came to him? Thus reminding him, that he was sent to instruct him concerning the things which would befall his people: but when he had executed this commission he would return back, and continue to counteract the devices of the Persian kings against the Jews, even till that monarchy should terminate; by which means many fatal effects would be prevented, and many troubles averted. And when that commission was executed, the prince of Grecia would come; or the Macedonian empire under Alexander and his successors would be established, and the chief danger and trouble to the Jews would arise from that quarter. But he would proceed more fully to open, and enlarge upon, the prophecies of the former Scriptures to the same effect; or rather to show what was written in the book of God's secret purposes, of which all prophecies are as an abstract. 'God's 'decrees are spoken of, as if they were committed to writ-'ing, and registered in a book.' (Lowth.) But Daniel might be assured, that he had not one friend in the court of Persia, who would concur with the angel, to forward the prophet's designs in behalf of his people, but Michael their Prince: and that he must depend on him alone to disappoint the devices which were forming against them. This forms the introduction to the prophecies in the next chapters, which were not proposed as emblems, but in plain language. A great deal is advanced by respectable expositors on these verses, about tutelary and guardian angels presiding over different countries, as if they strove one against another, each for his favourite country. This may indeed consist with either paganism or popery, but it is utterly incompatible with Christianity. The passage is allowed to be difficult: but perhaps careful consideration may allow the interpretation above given to be satisfactory. Daniel was chief president in Persia: yet not one of the princes or counsellors of that empire cordially united with him in doing good to the Jews: he must therefore look above to Michael their Prince, and his mighty angels, who would at length effect a revolution, by turning the dominion from Persia to Greece, which would be more favourable to the Jews, than Persia in after-times was.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

This world will continue to be a vale of tears to the greatest and best of men, as long as they live in it: for when they are most exempted from personal trials, they often see most cause to mourn over the calamities of the Church, and the sins which occasion them. When we duly lay these things to heart, and diligently seek to understand wherefore God contendeth with us or his people, and, as consciously guilty, afflict and humble ourselves by self-denial in things lawful, disrelishing earthly comforts, while such important concerns engross our attention, we may expect peculiar answers to our prayers. The more we delight in communion with God, the less we shall be attached to the pleasures of sense, and the more willing we shall be to forego them, that we may be at liberty for nobler joys. They who accustom themselves in youth to self-denial, will find it less grievous when they grow old: and in all cases, fasting, temperance, meditation and prayer, are happy means of obtaining discoveries of the glory of Christ to our souls. But we are better fitted to receive these discoveries by faith, than to behold with our bodily eyes the refulgence of his personal and mediatorial excellencies: and the secret defence and support of his Providence and Grace are more suited to our state in this world, than the thunder of his power manifested in our behalf, or his majestic word audibly spoken to us. Our frail and vile bodies are not able to support such glorious displays; nor will be, till corruption shall be swallowed up of life: the least intimations of the visions of God would fill us with terror; nor could we behold them (unless supernaturally spported,) without being overwhelmed with astonishment, and even reduced to corruption. We may then be thankful to be spoken to by men like ourselves, and by the small still voice of his teaching and comforting Spirit: and we should learn from these records to adore the unseen glorious Majesty of God our Saviour, and to be humbled under the sense of our meanness and sinfulness; seeing one of the best beloved of our race could not find courage and strength even to converse with a ministering spirit of the world above, in whom he saw such superior excellence and glory. The Lord will, however, support his servants under the discoveries of his Majesty and the sense of their own vileness, and he will prepare them to hear his word: when he hath cast them down, he will again raise them up, and make them know that he hath loved them; and he will gradually turn their trembling and sorrow into holy joy and confidence in him.—When we judge and chasten ourselves before God, we are most likely to escape his chastening. Whilst Satan, and his angels, and various evil counsellors, excite princes to devise mischief against his Church; we may rejoice that Christ our Prince, and all his mighty angels, hold with us in these things, and counteract the machinations of our enemies: but we should not expect that many others will favour us in this evil world, or in the courts of the princes of this world. All things, however, that are written in the Scriptures of truth, will certainly be accomplished, and the whole counsel of God shall be established. Our prayers are often put in a way of being effectually answered, before we have any assurance of their being accepted: let us then not be weary of well-doing, but continue in prayer, and we shall certainly prevail, if we faint not.

tending the affairs of Persia, he adds, that in the first year of Darius, (when perhaps it was debated whether the Jews should be freed or not) he was employed to confirm and establish him in his favourable dispositions. This measure was then in contemplation, but it was not determined on till after the death of Darius, and the succession of Cyrus.

V. 2—4. 'I will show thee the succession of the 'Persian and Grecian empire, in plain naked truth, not 'in symbolical or figurative representations, as it was 'showed before.' (Lowth.) 'The memorable events, 'which were revealed to Daniel in the vision of the ram 'and the he-goat, are here again more clearly and explicitly revealed, in his last vision, by an angel: so that this 'latter prophecy may not improperly be said to be a 'comment and explanation of the former.' (Bp. Newton.) —The three kings of Persia, here mentioned, were Cambyses the son of Cyrus, Smerdis the Magian, who falsely pretended to be another of his sons, and Darius Hystaspis, who married Cyrus's daughter. Xerxes, the son of this Darius, was the fourth king in Persia after Cyrus, who having inherited, or acquired, immense riches beyond conception, stirred up all his subjects and allies to invade Greece. For this expedition he collected the largest army that is read of in history, consisting of all sorts, of more than five millions of men; besides the Carthaginians, and others, whom he excited to war against the Grecians in other quarters. But though this tremendous invasion exceedingly wasted Greece; yet it was resisted by a very small number of the inhabitants, with the most determined valour, and the most decided success. The Persian troops were shamefully routed and dispersed, incredible numbers perished, and Xerxes returned home in disgrace, and almost unattended. This was one of the most memorable expeditions recorded in history: and it gave rise to those long wars and that inveterate hatred, betwixt the Grecians and Persians, which ended in the subversion of the Persian empire by Alexander. So that the prophecy, touching upon the principal events, passes over the nine subsequent Persian kings to the time of Alexander, as less worthy of notice; and contrasts his successful expedition against Persia with Xerxes's unsuccessful invasion of Greece. Alexander is here called "a mighty king, that should "stand up, and rule with great dominion, and do accord-"ing to his will;" which implies not only his extensive conquests and absolute authority, but his capricious tyranny, which cost some of his most faithful followers their lives, when they ventured to oppose his inclinations. But when he had acquired the summit of success, power, and renown, he was suddenly cut off, as we have seen; and his dominions were divided into four parts, not to his posterity, but his captains: and that did not equal the honour of his kingdom; which was thus plucked up, for the benefit of others, and not of his own family. The natural brother and the sons, with the mother and wife, of Alexander, in about fifteen years, perished, chiefly by treachery and murder; and then no remains of his family were left: and his captains, after many destructive wars, were all destroyed or reduced, except four, who became heads of four subordinate kingdoms. 'Cassander reigned 'in Greece and the west, Lysimachus in Thrace and the 'north, Ptolemy in Egypt and the south, and Seleucus 'in Syria and the east.' (Bp. Newton.) (Note, vii. 5.)

V. 5. Though the dominions of Alexander were divided into four parts; yet two of these kings soon became more eminent than the others, and often seized upon a great part of their dominions: namely, the kings of Egypt and of Syria, called in this prophecy the kings of the south and of the north, as Egypt lay to the south and Syria to the north of Judea. These two kingdoms alone are noticed in what follows: because Judea lay betwixt them, and was affected by all their contests and transactions. This verse is rather obscure: it is, however, generally allowed to mean, that Ptolemy Lagus king of Egypt would soon become powerful, as one of Alexander's princes: but that another of them, (even Seleucus Nicator king of Syria,) would be strong above him; for he was the conqueror of the conquerors, and gained the ascendency over them, engrossed a vast proportion of Alexander's dominions, and outlived all his competitors.

V. 6. Antiochus Soter succeeded Seleucus, and was succeeded by Antiochus Theus, in the kingdom of Syria; and Ptolemy Philadelphus reigned in Egypt after his father Ptolemy Lagus. During this time, there were frequent wars between these neighbouring and rival monarchs,

But at length they entered into a treaty of peace; to confirm which Antiochus agreed to put away his wife Laodice with her sons, and to marry Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy. Thus the daughter of the king of the south came to the king of the north, to make an agreement with him, and brought with her an immense dowry: but she could not retain the power of the arm, the interest that she had acquired: for Antiochus recalled Laodice, and put away Berenice; and Laodice fearing another change poisoned her husband, and caused Berenice to be murdered, with her attendants. So that Antiochus himself could not stand his ground, or retain his power; and Berenice was delivered to destruction, and those that brought her, and he "whom she had brought forth," or her son, (for so the words are generally rendered:) nor was her father able to defend her, for he died about the same time. Such were the consequences of this disastrous marriage and alliance.

V. 7—9. Ptolemy Euergetes, brother to Berenice, a branch out of the same root, standing up in his father's estate, came with a great army to avenge his sister's death on Seleucus Callinicus, son of Laodice, who had succeeded to the throne of Syria. And he entered forcibly into the fortresses, or provinces of that kingdom, and easily prevailed against Seleucus. So that, when a sedition in Egypt recalled him home, he carried away with him many captives; and not only the nobles, but the gods, of Syria were thus brought into Egypt. It is said that he took home with him no less than two thousand five hundred idols; among which were some that Cambyses had formerly carried out of Egypt: and for this service the superstitous Egyptains honoured him with the title of Euergetes, or the Benefactor. With these captive princes and images, he also carried off vast treasures; and having avenged himself on Seleucus, he continued more years than he, surviving him four or five years, and remaining unmolested in his own kingdom.

V. 10—12. Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus the Great, the sons of Seleucus Callinicus, were stirred up to war against the king of Egypt, in hopes of recovering the territories which had been taken from their father. But Ceraunus was poisoned by one of his discontented captains; and Antiochus was left to pursue the war alone. This circumstance was marked in the prophecy; for after mention had been made of "his sons," it is added, "He," or one of them, shall certainly come, &c. Ptolemy Philopater had succeeded Euergetes his father in the kingdom of Egypt, before these events took place: and Antiochus made war upon him, over-ran the countries that he held in Asia, and spread desolations like a flood wherever he passed through. Then making a truce with Ptolemy, during which both parties treated of peace and prepared for war, Antiochus returned to attack Ptolemy's forces, and overcame them, and carried the war even to the borders of Egypt, which he threatened with an invasion. This exceedingly exasperated Ptolemy, who marched against him with a great army, gave him battle, entirely defeated Antiochus' numerous forces, obliged him to retreat to Antioch, and thence to send ambassadors to treat of peace. But Ptolemy did not pursue the advantages of this decisive victory; for, being elated with his success, he gave himself up to the most shameful debaucheries. After the retreat of Antiochus, he visited the cities of his Asiatic dominions, and Jerusalem among the rest; and being with difficulty restrained from entering into the holy of holies, he was so displeased with the Jews, that he destroyed, some say, forty thousand, others sixty thousand, of his Jewish subjects in Egypt, by a most furious persecution; and his casting down so many tens of thousands of his own subjects would of course weaken his kingdom, and conduce to its ruin.

V. 13—16. After some years, Antiochus recovered from the effects of his late defeat: and Ptolemy Philopater being dead, and succeeded by his son Ptolemy Epiphanes, who was only four or five years of age, Antiochus raised a greater army than before, and amassed vast sums of money to defray the expenses of the war, by which he hoped to deprive the minor king of his dominions. And at the same time that Antiochus marched his army to attack the Egyptian provinces, many other enemies stood up against the young king. For the conduct of his father, and of those abandoned ministers who now governed in his name, had so disgusted the Egyptians, that they were ready to join Antiochus; and Philip, king of Macedon, made a league with him against Ptolemy, stipulating to divide his kingdom betwixt them. The persecuted Jews also became refractory, and broke off from their allegiance to the king of Egypt, to join Antiochus; for this seems to be the meaning of the words translated, "the robbers of "thy people." These revolters exalted themselves against their former masters, and so helped to establish, or accomplish, this vision, or prophecy: but they were reduced by Ptolemy's forces, who under Scopas gained many advantages against those of Antiochus. However, the presence of that prince turned the scale in his favour; for he soon recovered what Scopas had taken, and besieged and took Zidon, and others of Ptolemy's best fortified cities. So that the king of Egypt could not withstand his arms, even with his choicest troops; but he carried all before him, and succeeded in his designs, and established his authority in the land of Judah, the glorious land of God's chosen people, and of his special presence; which was by him consumed, in furnishing subsistence to his troops: or rather it was by him perfected or established, as some render the word; for it was favoured, and prospered greatly under his government.

V. 17. Antiochus after this success set himself, with all the strength of his kingdom, to get possession of Egypt; being assisted by the Jews, called upright ones, as worshipping JEHOVAH, in contradistinction to idolaters: or, as the phrase may mean, making an agreement with him, that is, with Ptolemy: for he attempted to circumvent him by treaty, as well as to subdue him by arms. Thus he endeavoured to accomplish his purpose: and to induce Ptolemy to enter into treaty with him, he gave him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage; whose singular beauty is supposed to be intimated by the expression, the daughter of women, that is, the most accomplished daughter of women. In this he meant fraudulently, for he thought to corrupt his daughter to betray the interests of her husband; but the project failed: for Ptolemy was aware of the artifice, and kept upon his guard; and Cleopatra preferred the interests of her husband to those of her insidious father, and even joined in an embassy to the Romans, craving protection against him.

V. 18, 19. Antiochus, not being able to execute this project, turned his arms another way, and attacked many of the isles and cities bordering on the Mediterranean sea. (Marg. Ref.) This offended the Romans, who deemed themselves insulted by this treatment of their allies: and in their own behalf, to vindicate the honour of their state, they proclaimed war against him; and their generals soon drove him out of Europe, pursued him into Asia, by a most decisive victory deprived him of a great part of his dominions, and compelled him to submit to a very hard and dishonourable peace. Nor did he long survive this disgrace: for finding difficulty in raising the sums of money which the Romans exacted from him, he attempted to plunder a rich temple of Jupiter Belus, in the province of Elymais, where he was slain by the enraged inhabitants. Thus he returned from his rash European expedition to Antioch, his strong-hold, and soon after stumbled, and fell, and was not found.

V. 20. "Then shall stand up one in his estate, who "causeth an exactor to pass over the glory of his king-"dom:" thus the words may be rendered. Seleucus Philopater, who succeeded his father, being obliged to pay a large annual tribute to the Romans, performed nothing memorable, except levying money from his subjects for this and other purposes. These exactions tarnished the glory of his kingdom; and within a few days or years, (for he reigned twelve years,) he was slain by Heliodorus, whom he had employed to rob the temple of God at Jerusalem. Thus he was destroyed, neither in anger, nor in battle, but by treachery: for Heliodorus hoped to succeed to the throne; as Demetrius the son of Seleucus was a hostage at Rome, and Antiochus his brother was absent from the Syrian court. This project however was disappointed.

V. 21. Antiochus, who succeeded his brother Seleucus, was returning from Rome when he heard of his murder by Heliodorus. "The honour of the kingdom was "not given to him;" for Heliodorus intended to seize it for himself, others aimed to give it to the king of Egypt, and Demetrius the son of Seleucus was the proper heir of it: so that no party thought of placing Antiochus on the throne. But "he came in peaceably, and obtained it by "flatteries." He flattered Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and his brother Attalus, and by fair promises engaged them to support him: he flattered the Syrians with a fair show of clemency; and, as some say, by pretending to hold the crown for his nephew till his return from Rome, by which he obtained peaceable possession: and he flattered the Romans, with the assurance of being a faithful and good ally; and thus he came in, to the exclusion of all his rivals. He was also in turn flattered with the title of Epiphanes, or the illustrious; though some more justly called him Epimanes, or the madman. However, the expression of the angel to Daniel, a vile person, best befitted him; for his frantic, indecent, and contemptible behaviour, in many respects, proved him to be all that can be implied in such a title.

V. 22, 23. Antiochus was at first successful in war: for "with the arms of a flood shall they be overflowed "before him;" or, "the arms of the overflower shall be "overflowed before him;" that is, Heliodorus and his other opponents, whose power seemed ready to bear all before it, were speedily borne down by Antiochus, and entirely destroyed. "Yea, also the prince of the covenant." Most expositors understand this of the Jewish high-priest, the prince of God's covenanted people: for as soon as Antiochus was seated on the throne, he expelled Onias from the high-priesthood, and sold it to his younger brother Jason for a large sum of money; and Onias was soon after cruelly murdered by Antiochus's deputy. But after his agreement with Jason he acted deceitfully: for induced by another sum of money, he by force of arms deposed Jason, and advanced Menelaus his brother to that dignity. "For," or rather, "and he shall come up and shall become strong "with a small people." He had come from Rome with few attendants: his power in Syria was at first inconsiderable; yet from small beginnings he became exceedingly strong. Some, however, explain this of Ptolemy Philometor; between whom and Antiochus a league, or covenant of peace, had been ratified: yet afterwards he wrought deceitfully, and at length, when become sufficiently strong, he made war upon Ptolemy.

V. 24—26. Antiochus had greater success both against the Egyptian provinces in Asia, and against that kingdom itself, than any of his predecessors had had: and he also exceeded them in liberality, or rather extravagance; for he scattered among the people, wherever he went, the prey that he had taken from his enemies, the spoil of cities and temples, the riches of his friends, and his own revenues; so that his profusion exceeded that of any of his progenitors. Thus he fixed the people in his interests: and when his authority was established at home, he began to forecast devices against the strong-holds of Ptolemy, that still held out against him; and he was preparing during some years for the war that he meditated. At length with all his power and courage he led a great army against the king of Egypt, who sent his generals with a mighty force to oppose his progress: but Antiochus prevailed, through the fraudulent counsels and treacherous conduct of Ptolemy's partizans. And the next year Antiochus obtained still more decided advantages, and got possession of almost all Egypt. For Ptolemy's ministers and servants helped in different ways to ruin his interests; as some of them betrayed his cause, and others exasperated the people to revolt by their base and abominable practices: and thus Ptolemy Physcon his brother was set up for king in opposition to him. By these means Antiochus's forces prevailed, and great numbers of Ptolemy's were slain.

V. 27, 28. By what means Ptolemy Philometor came into the hands of Antiochus is not known; he seems, however, to have been his prisoner. Thus they frequently ate at the same table, or met at the same council-board, and pretended to be amicably disposed, and to enter into a treaty; but they were both bent on mischief, and told lies to each other. Antiochus pretended a great regard to Ptolemy's interest, and to secure him against the designs of his brother; and Ptolemy professed to confide in Antiochus, and to deem himself bound to him by the strongest ties: whereas Antiochus only meant to weaken the two brothers by fomenting their discords, till he should be able to seize upon the whole kingdom; and Ptolemy was aiming to effect a reconciliation with his brother, that they might unite in expelling the invader. But this fraud did not fully prosper on either side: Antiochus could not get possession of the whole kingdom; and Ptolemy could not drive him out of it. Antiochus was at length induced to leave Egypt and return to Syria, with immense treasures that he had seized; and his heart was turned against the holy covenant; for the report being spread of his death, it occasioned great rejoicings and some insurrections among the Jews; which so exasperated him, that he resolved to be revenged on the nation. Accordingly he besieged and took Jerusalem, slew forty thousand of its inhabitants, and sold twice that number for slaves; he then polluted the temple with swine's flesh and various defilements; he even entered with violence into the holy of holies; he plundered the sacred treasures; and having succeeded thus far, he returned home to Antioch.

V. 29, 30. After an interval of two years, in the time before appointed of God, Antiochus returned to renew his attempts against Egypt, and finding that the two brothers were amicably providing for their common safety, he made war upon them with great impetuosity and success. However, this expedition terminated in a different manner, from either of the preceding: for the Roman state sent ambassadors to him, at the request of the Ptolemies, commanding him to lay down his arms, and not to molest their allies. Perhaps these ambassadors came in Grecian ships, or the name Chittim signifies the several European countries that border on the Mediterranean sea. They executed their commission in the most peremptory and decisive manner; for one of them made a circle with his cane round Antiochus, and insisted on his answer before he passed out of that circle; being determined to declare war against him, if he hesitated to comply with his demands: and Antiochus, not daring to bring upon himself the whole power of the Romans, who were then free from other wars, was forced to submit. Thus he was checked in his full career of victory, to his extreme vexation; and returning home full of grief and shame, he vented his indignation against the Jews, the covenant-people of God: 'for 'he detached Apollonius with an army of twenty-two-'thousand men, who, coming to Jerusalem, slew great 'multitudes, plundered the city, set fire to it in several 'places, and pulled down the houses. Then they builded 'up a strong eminence in the city of David, a strong 'fortress, which might command the temple; and issuing 'from thence, they fell on those that came to worship, 'and shed innocent blood on every side of the sanctuary, 'and defiled it: so that the temple was deserted, and the 'whole service omitted; the city was forsaken of the 'natives, and became an habitation for strangers. "So "he did" 'at the time; and after his return to Antioch 'he published a decree, which obliged all persons under 'pain of death to conform to the religion of the Greeks: 'and so the Jewish law was abrogated, and the heathen 'worship was set up in its stead, and the temple itself 'was consecrated to Jupiter Olympius. In transacting 'these matters, "he had intelligence with them that for-"sook the holy covenant," 'that is, with Menelaus, and 'other apostate Jews of his party.' (Bp. Newton.) Indeed, the distresses of the Jews in those days arose principally from the machinations of their countrymen, who joined the enemies of their nation and religion. 'There 'is not so complete and regular a series of these kings, 'nor so concise and comprehensive an account of their 'affairs, to be found in any author of those times.' 'So 'that it is necessary to have recourse to several authors, 'Greek and Roman, Jewish and Christian, to collect 'something from one, and something from another, to ex-'plain and illustrate the great variety of particulars con-'tained in this prophecy.' 'No one could thus declare 'the times and seasons, but he who hath them in his own 'power.' (Acts i. 7.) (Bp. Newton.)

V. 31. Thus far the prophecy is clear, and the interpretation satisfactory: but the subsequent part is very difficult, and commentators have differed exceedingly about it. Some have explained the whole of Antiochus Epiphanes; some have made him a type of Antichrist; and others extend some parts of it to the subsequent kings of Syria: nay, some expositors decline giving any interpretation of these predictions; except as they stop to show us how impossible it is to apply many things in it to Antiochus. But though all that follows in this vision cannot be explained of the short-lived exploits of this "vile per-"son," yet a similarity of character and conduct, betwixt him and future oppressors of God's people, might give occasion to the inspired writer, or to the angel, to glide from one to the other by an almost imperceptible transition. As Antiochus had the power of the sword on his part, his captains seized on and polluted the sanctuary, which had been strongly fortified, and which was itself the defence of the people; and they entirely suppressed the stated worship, and placed a base idol in the temple of God, which was an abomination that desolated the city and sanctuary, by driving thence all pious Jews: they also builded idol-altars in all the cities of Judah. This therefore may apply to Antiochus. But very eminent expositors suppose, that the transition before-mentioned begins here to take place: and that, as it must shortly be admitted, it cannot be better introduced, than here. 'In the same 'year that Antiochus, by the command of the Romans, 'retired out of Egypt, and set up the worship of the 'Greeks in Judea, the Romans conquered the kingdom of 'Macedon, the fundamental kingdom of the empire of 'the Greeks, and reduced it into a Roman province; and 'thereby began to put an end to the reign of Daniel's 'third beast. This is thus expressed by Daniel: "And "after him arms," (that is the Romans,) "shall stand "up." Arms are every where in this prophecy put for 'the military power of a kingdom; and they stand up, 'when they conquer and grow powerful. Hitherto Daniel 'described the actions of the kings of the north and the 'south: but upon the conquest of Macedon by the Ro-'mans, he left off describing the actions of the Greeks, 'and began to describe those of the Romans in Greece.' (Sir Is. Newton.) 'In support of this interpretation, it 'may be further added, that the Jews themselves, as 'Jerome informs us, understood this passage neither of 'Antiochus Epiphanes, nor of Antichrist, but of the 'Romans; of whom it was said above, that "the ships "of Chittim shall come," &c. After some time, says 'the prophet, out of the Romans themselves, who came 'to assist Ptolemy, and menaced Antiochus, there shall 'arise the emperor Vespasian; there shall arise his arms 'and seed, his son Titus with an army, and they shall 'pollute the sanctuary, and take away the daily sacrifice, 'and deliver the temple to eternal desolation.' (Bp. New-'ton.) 'We must know, that after the death of Antiochus 'Epiphanes, the third kingdom comes no more into the 'holy reckoning; none of the Greek kings after him being 'at all prophesied of. The reason of this is, because, 'during the reign of Antiochus, Macedonia, (whence that 'kingdom sprang,) with all the rest of Greece, came 'under the Roman obedience. From thence therefore the 'Holy Ghost begins the rise of the fourth kingdom, yea, 'the Roman historians themselves mark out that time for 'the rise of their empire.' (Mede.) 'Our Saviour him-'self, making use of the same phrase, the abomination of 'desolation, in his prediction of the destruction of Jerusa-'lem, may convince us, that this part of the prophecy re-'fers to that event.' (Bp. Newton.) The emphatical manner in which our Lord quotes this prophecy of Daniel, (Marg. Ref.) greatly confirms this argument. Indeed, the concluding verse of the ninth chapter contains nearly the same language, in an express prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. There can remain no doubt with any one, who carefully compares the concluding part of this chapter and the next chapter with the other scriptures; accurately examines the import of the words employed; and attentively considers the records of history; that the fourth kingdom, even that of the Romans, is predicted. First Rome Pagan, then Rome Christian, and then Rome Antichristian, must be intended; whether the transition be made at this verse, or not till the thirty-sixth: for no other power, that has hitherto appeared on earth, at all answers to the description here given, or has had dominion during so long a term of time, as the angel plainly marks out. The persecutions and profanations of the temple, by Antiochus Epiphanes, began about one hundred and sixty-eight years before the Christian Æra: he died not more than four years afterwards: the Romans soon began to disturb the Jews: at length Pompey, about sixty-three years before the Christian Æra, took Jerusalem, and entered into the holy of holies. He, however, in other respects, neither plundered nor profaned the temple. But from that time, Jerusalem was dependent on the Romans, and subject to those whom they made kings or governors, till the destruction of the city and temple by Titus: and in the year of our Lord one hundred and thirty-two, the emperor Adrian caused a temple to be erected to Jupiter Capitolinus, on the very spot where the temple of God before stood, and banished the Jews from Jerusalem and its neighbourhood. Thus "the abomina-"tion that maketh desolate," was effectually placed in "the "sanctuary of strength," to pollute it; and "the daily sac-"rifice was taken away." Yet these events seem also to have been, in some degree, figures of the corruptions introduced into the Christian Church, by the idolatries of Antichristian Rome. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 32, 33. Antiochus doubtless corrupted many of the Jews to do wickedly, by his flattering promises and rewards: and the remnant that knew, trusted, and loved their God, were greatly strengthened, and did wonders, both in supporting his cruel tortures, and resisting his usurped and abused authority: but it cannot so well be said, that they instructed many, or made numerous converts to their religion. And though they endured severe things, yet it was not for many days; three years and a half being a very short time in the language of prophecy. But the Romans not only destroyed Jerusalem, and took away the daily sacrifice; but during their dominion they both crucified Christ, persecuted his followers, and also set themselves to extirpate Christianity: and their magistrates used the most alluring promises and flatteries, as well as the most terrible threatenings, to prevail with Christians to apostatize and worship idols. Many were thus corrupted and did wickedly. But the real Christians were enabled to resist all these temptations, and to adhere to their religion with the most heroic constancy: and through the whole extent of the Roman empire, as well as in other places, Christianity was propagated. At the same time they were exposed to death by the sword and flame, and to be carried captive, and spoiled, for many days: for the ten persecutions of the Roman emperors lasted almost three hundred years, with only short intermissions of rest and peace. The dispersion of the apostles, teachers, and Christians, in the primitive times, by persecution, greatly promoted the promulgation of the Gospel. They understood, and were wise, and carried their wisdom with them, and instructed immense multitudes. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 34, 35. When the Jews fell under the persecutions of Antiochus, Mattathias of Modin, and his son Judas Maccabeus, revolted from the persecutors; and after the death of Mattathias, Judas several times vanquished the armies of Antiochus with very inferior forces: at length he recovered Jerusalem, cleansed the sanctuary, restored the worship of God, and survived Antiochus; and both the priesthood and sovereignty remained in that family for several generations. The small force of these Jewish heroes might be called "a little help:" yet in fact it proved a most effectual help. But if we advert to what succeeded the persecutions before-mentioned, we shall perceive a more unexceptionable interpretation. After the Christians had long fallen under the power of their persecutors, the conversion of Constantine gave them a deliverance: they were no longer persecuted, but favoured by the Roman emperor and his deputies. Yet this proved but a little help to the cause of true religion; it added much to the temporal prosperity of the Church, but it greatly tended to debase the character of professed Christians. Especially it caused many to cleave to them with flatteries; for hypocrisy became prevalent amongst both the clergy and laity, who were intent on flattering the emperor and those in authority, for their own interest. And indeed persecution soon revived within the Church, the different parties cruelly harassing each other by turns: and they who had most understanding in true religion were commonly most oppressed; being permitted to fall into these calamities, to try and prove them, and to distinguish them from false professors, as well as purge away their defilement and make them white. This was to continue "to the time of the end; because it was yet for an appointed time." These expressions cannot be applied to the persecuted Jews in the days of Antiochus; for that did not bring either their calamities, or those of the Church, to an end: but the persecutions that Christians have suffered, from their professed fellow Christians, began from the days of Constantine, and have continued more or less to this day; and they will continue till the appointed time of the Jews' conversion, the ruin of every antichristian power, and the last great spread of the Gospel.

V. 36. After the Romans had stopped the progress of Antiochus in Egypt, he was no more able to do according to his will, or to exalt himself; except as he cruelly oppressed the Jews: and even in this he was finally baffled: he indeed spake marvellous things against the God of gods; but he could not be said to magnify himself against every god, for he was remarkable for his superstition and idolatry. The prophecy therefore could not receive its accomplishment in him. "Then a king shall do according "to his will," &c. 'Under the name king must be understood the Roman state, under what kind of government soever.' (Mede.) 'The prophet was speaking of 'the persecutions, which would be permitted for the trial '—of the Church, after the empire was become Christian; and now he proceeds to describe the principal 'author of these persecutions. After the empire was 'become Christian, there would spring up in the Church 'an antichristian power, that should—exalt itself above 'all laws human and divine; dispense with the most sacred 'and solemn obligations; and in many respects enjoin 'what God had forbidden, and forbid what God had commanded. This power too was to continue in the Church, 'and "prosper, till the indignation was accomplished; "for that that is determined shall be done." This must 'denote some particular period; otherwise it is no more 'than saying, that God's indignation shall not be accomplished, till it be accomplished. This is the same that 'was called, (viii. 19,) "the last end of the indignation," 'and, (ix. 27,) "the consummation;" 'and it meaneth 'the last end of his indignation against his people, the 'Jews,' (xii. 7.) (Bp. Newton.) St. Paul seems to have referred to this prophecy of Daniel, in his extraordinary prediction of "the Man of Sin;" and in great measure to have both sanctioned the general outlines of the above interpretation; and to have still more fully elucidated it; especially in respect of marvellous things spoken against the God of gods. (Marg. Ref.) The series of the predicted events also leads us to the same interpretations.—After the empire became Christian, a king, (or kingdom,) gradually sprang up in it, of a most absolute and tyrannical nature "doing according to his own will," with the most avowed defiance of God's laws; and requiring the most implicit obedience from men of all ranks, orders, and nations. The emperors first exercised, or excited, this power by their ecclesiastical councils: but it gradually passed into the hands of the clergy; and the bishop and church of Rome at last carried it to the most enormous height, exalting and magnifying themselves above every god. These have long prospered, and will, more or less, do so, till the Lord's indignation against his people shall be accomplished, and the determined period of the calamities of the Church be expired.

V. 37. In what sense could it be said, that Antiochus did not regard the god of his fathers, when he compelled the Jews to worship Jupiter Olympius? Or, that he regarded not the desire of women; when, besides being married, he was excessive and shameless in his indulgence of his lust, and did nothing to restrain others from the same? 'The desire of women and of the married life, the Roman should discountenance, when he shook off the gods 'of his ancestors.' (Mede.) It is certain that Constantine, the first Christian emperor, in various ways discouraged marriage and honoured celibacy, thus acting in direct opposition to the ancient policy of Rome; and that the subsequent idolatry and blasphemy of the antichristian power were accompanied by a proportionable discountenancing of marriage, till it was totally prohibited to the ministers of religion. By "the desire of women," (or wives, as it may be rendered,) beyond all doubt, the desire of marriage is meant: and where on earth has any power, or government, permanently and avowedly stigmatized marriage as dishonourable, and almost idolized celibacy and virginity, except that of Rome, even from the conversion of the emperors to this day, and those who have retained some measure of her antichristianity? (Marg. Ref.) Most interpreters, however, suppose, that the virtual apostacy of the antichristian power from the true God, is meant by his "not regarding the God of his fathers."

V. 38. "For together with God, in his seat shall he "honour Mahuzzim; even together with that God whom "his ancestors knew not, shall he honour (them) with "gold and with silver, and with precious stones, and "with pleasant things." (Mede.) Mahuzzim is the plural of the word translated a fortress, a strong tower, or a rock, in very many places of Scripture. 'True Christians have, with David, but one Mahoz, the "Mahoz "of salvations:" 'but apostate Christians have their 'many Mahuzzim.' 'By the strange and foreign God, '(38) whom the Roman should at length acknowledge, is 'meant Christ: for though to the Jew every strange and 'foreign god was a false god; yet to the Gentiles, who 'worshipped none but idols, the foreign God was the 'true. Therefore the philosophers at Athens, when St. 'Paul preached Christ to them, said he preached a foreign 'God.' (Mede.) To this it may be added, that the true God was to them the UNKNOWN GOD; "whom their "fathers knew not." 'With this foreign God, he shall 'worship Mahuzzim, gods-protectors, such as saints and 'angels are supposed to be.' (Mede.) The translation of this verse, as above given, seems far more literal than our version: and it is certain, that from the time when the Roman power began to profess the worship of the true God, and of Christ his coequal Son, (whom their fathers knew not;) they began to corrupt Christianity, by substituting saints and angels, as protectors and mediators, in the place of the genii and demons of paganism. They did not renounce the worship of God, or the mediation of Christ: but along with this "one God and one Lord," they worshipped "gods many and lords many:" and the reader may find in Mr. Mede's works, and in Sir Isaac Newton's observations on this prophecy, most astonishing instances of the early introduction of this idolatry, and the gross language used by the fathers even of the fourth century in respect of it. Mr. Mede's interpretation of this clause seems indeed well grounded; but it has not been generally admitted. "And the god Mahuzzim, in his "estate he shall honour; even a god whom his fathers "knew not," &c. (Bp. Newton.) But Mahuzzim is plural, and denotes towers, or fortresses; whereas the word translated god, in the second clause, is singular, and cannot mean the same with Mahuzzim; but must signify, either the true God, or some particular idol or false god.—The verse may be translated thus; "And with God, or "instead of God, Mahuzzim in his estate shall he honour; "even with God, or instead of God, those whom his fathers "have not known shall he honour," &c. (Bp. Newton.)—If this translation be adopted, then the objects of worship, which the fathers of those concerned had not known, are the same as Mahuzzim. It should, however, be observed, that the translation or interpretation of this clause, in either way, does not in the least deduct from the certainty of the exposition in other respects. The meaning evidently is, that the worship of Mahuzzim of protectors, and guardians, instead of God, as God, or with God, is indisputably predicted, if there be any meaning in words: and the practice of the church of Rome from very early ages to this day is plainly intended; while the profusion of rich oblations, at the shrines of their saints, fully explains and illustrates the concluding part of the verse. 'And who is there so little 'acquainted with ecclesiastical history, as not to know, 'that the worship of saints and angels was established 'both in the Greek and Latin church? They were not 'only invocated and adored, as patrons, intercessors, and 'guardians of mankind; but festival days were instituted 'to them, miracles were ascribed to them, churches were 'erected to them; their very reliques were worshipped, 'and shrines and images were adorned with the most costly 'offerings, and were honoured with gold, and silver, and 'with precious stones, and desirable things. And what 'renders the completion of the prophecy the more remarkable is, that they were adored under the title of Mahuzzim, of bulwarks, fortresses, of protectors and guardians

' of mankind.' (Bp. Newton.) Even the dead bodies of saints were called by the fathers of the fourth century, ' great towers of the martyrs, fortifying cities more strongly than any impregnable wall of adamant,' and much more to this effect. Such expressions are to be found in many ancient, and even modern, liturgies and manuals of prayers, applied to the virgin Mary, and to saints and angels: and in the eighth century this idolatrous worship was fully established by law.

V. 39. "And he shall make," (or appoint, or prepare) "for his strong-holds Mahuzzim, along with the "foreign God; to whom," (Mahuzzim,) "acknowledging, he shall multiply honour: and he shall cause them "to rule over many, and shall divide the earth for a re"ward." Thus the verse may be translated, perhaps as literally as the construction will admit of. The word rendered do, in our version, is known to have a most extensive meaning, and may well be supposed here to signify appoint or prepare: and except the preposition to, nothing varies in the least from the most literal translation in other respects; now the relative in numerous places is thus used in the Hebrew without the prefix, which is supposed to be understood. If this be admitted, then the interpretation is plain. The strong-holds of this antichristian power are his churches and monasteries, which he would consecrate to saints, or angels, or to God and his saints. Having once acknowledged the Mahuzzim, as objects of religious worship, as gods-protectors, he would honour them more and more, from age to age. He would invest them with a dominion, (as far as he could do it,) not only over men on earth, but even over those who have entered the unseen world, and induce vast multitudes to seek deliverance out of purgatory, for their deceased relations and friends, from their powerful intercession, and to purchase, at a vast expense, masses and prayers from the priests and monks for that purpose. Let it here be remembered, that this power hath invested the apostle Peter with the keys of heaven itself, that as his successor he might claim the same authority over the eternal state of mankind at large! And, finally, he would divide the earth among them. ' St. ' George shall have England, St. Andrew, Scotland, St. ' Dennis, France, St. James, Spain, St. Mark, Venice, ' &c.; and bear rule as presidents and patrons of their ' several countries.' (Mede.) It must be remembered, that the secular possessions of the Pope, are called St. Peter's patrimony: and, doubtless, this dividing of the earth among the Mahuzzim was made a source of great gain, accruing from the several countries thus placed under the guardian care of these several saints.

—' Thus shall he do: to the defenders of Mahuzzim, "together with the strange god whom he shall acknow"ledge, he shall multiply honour; and he shall cause "them to rule over many, and the earth shall he divide "for a reward." ' The defenders and champions of ' Mahuzzim were the monks, and priests, and bishops,— ' and religious orders: and that they have been honoured, ' and reverenced, and almost adored, in former ages; that ' their authority and jurisdiction have extended over the ' purses and consciences of men; that they have been ' enriched with noble buildings and large endowments, and ' have had the choicest of the lands appropriated for church ' lands; are points of such public notoriety, that they re' quire no proof.' (Bp. Newton.) The word rendered strong-holds, may, in a figurative sense, mean defenders; as Mahuzzim (towers) may signify protectors: and thus Bishop Newton's translation is very just, and in general the explanation is striking: but what then are we to understand by the strange god? He is here distinguished from the Mahuzzim; though the bishop's interpretation of the preceding verse seems to make him the same. But it has been shown, that the God whom the ancestors of this power had not known, cannot be the same as the Mahuzzim; because, in both places, the word is singular, (in a language which generally has the name of God in the plural,) and must mark out some one object of worship distinct from the Mahuzzim. If, therefore, Mr. Mede's interpretation be not admitted, perhaps that may be most entitled to attention, which supposes the worship of the consecrated bread, as if Christ were bodily present by transubstantiation, to be intended. However, whether the Mahuzzim or their defenders, (the defenders of gods-protectors!) be meant, the history of the Roman church most surprisingly verifies the prediction.

V. 40—43. Antiochus Epiphanes had no more wars with the Egyptians, after the persecutions of the Jews before stated; but ended his life in an expedition against the Persians. Nor is it likely, that the prediction should return from the times which we have been considering, to the wars of the Syrian and Egyptian kings. But rather we should expect, that the series of events would proceed, or collateral circumstances should be noticed. The kings of the north and the south were the kings of Syria and Egypt, till these kingdoms were swallowed up by the Roman empire. But at the time of the end, that is of the prosperity of that empire, when it was about to be broken to pieces, (Marg. Ref.) "the king of the south would "push at him:" this predicts, as some eminent expositors suppose, the victories of the Saracens under Mahomet and his successors; who coming from the south made war upon the eastern division of the Roman empire, and seized on several of its finest provinces: yet they did not utterly subvert it. And it is remarkable, that the doctrine of Mahomet was first forged at Mecca, and the supremacy of the pope was established by a grant from Phocas, in the very same year of Christ, 606: so that the eastern and western antichrists began their reign together, and will probably terminate them at no great distance of time from each other. But though the Saracens from the south, or Arabia, dismembered and weakened the eastern empire: yet the Turks from Scythia, a northern region, totally subverted it. This king of the north came against the king of the south, (who had subjugated the eastern part of the Roman empire,) "like a whirlwind, with chariots, and "horsemen," of which the Turkish armies chiefly consisted: "and with many ships," without which they could not have got possession of so many maritime countries: thus they entered and overflowed them like an inundation, and so passed over. They overspread the western parts of Asia, and then passing over into Europe, they fixed their empire at Constantinople, upon the ruins of the eastern empire, which had long before been divided from that of Rome in the west. Among other conquests, it was predicted that this king of the north would enter into the glorious land, or the land of Canaan: this the Turks did, and they are masters of it to this day. "And many "countries were by them overthrown," as Syria and Palestine: but they were never able to subdue the Arabian tribes, or the mixed people, which inhabited the regions formerly occupied by Edom, Moab, and Ammon, whose posterity are probably now incorporated with the Ishmaelites and Midianites. These escaped them: and to this day the Ottoman emperors pay the Arabs an annual pension of forty thousand crowns, for the safe passage of their pilgrims and caravans to Mecca; and yet even this often fails of protecting them from plunder. None of this can apply to Antiochus: but especially he never conquered Egypt, Lybia, or Ethiopia: he never did any thing important, after his repulse by the Romans. But the Turkish princes stretched forth their hands to grasp these countries, and got possession of their treasures, and were enriched, and strengthened by the acquisition; carrying away also vast multitudes of the inhabitants captive to Constantinople: and these and other regions of Africa remain in their hands to this day, along with their Asiatic and European dominions. (Notes, &c. Ezek. xxix, xxx.)

V. 44, 45. All the attempts of commentators to apply this to Antiochus have proved fruitless: for though he went forth with great indignation to subdue some revolted provinces in the east and in the north; yet he never returned into Judea, which land alone can be intended by "the glorious holy mountain." It is more probably concluded, that this part of the prophecy relates to events yet future. Some conjecture that the Persians, who border on the Turkish dominions to the east, and the Russians who lie north of them, will unite against the Turks; that in the land of Canaan the latter will fix their camp with great ostentation, as well as wage the war with great fury; and that there they shall receive such a defeat, as shall end in the utter subversion of their monarchy. But it may perhaps refer to events, which have before been mentioned, (Notes, &c. Ez. xxxviii, xxxix:) namely, the return of the Jews to their own land after their conversion, and the assistance to be given them by the Christian European powers; which tidings from the east and north must needs trouble the Turkish princes, who possess the country that is again to be restored to the Jews. And thus going forth with great fury to war against the Jews, and having pitched their camp between the Mediterranean sea and the Dead sea, in the mountains of Judea, they will be suddenly and surprisingly ruined without help or recovery. Thus the ruin of the eastern antichrist will not be far distant from that of the western; both of which seem to be predicted in this chapter. The word rendered, "to make "away," signifies to curse, and seems to intimate, that the war would be on a religious account. As, however, this part of the prophecy certainly is yet unfulfilled, we ought not too freely to indulge conjecture, where the evident meaning of the prophecy does not fully authorise our conclusions.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—19.

The predictions of the Scripture not only confirm the doctrines contained in it; but they tend to establish our faith in the over-ruling providence of God, which is thus sensibly demonstrated to us. Little do men in general imagine, how much even the determinations of princes and senates are influenced by the agency of good or bad spirits. In mercy to his people, the Lord employs his mighty angels to strengthen and confirm those who know him not, in every determination and measure that he sees will prove for the good of his servants: and they are thus imperceptibly directed by an external agent, when they most entirely follow their own inclinations. Whilst wealth and power animate men to engage in ambitious projects; they are sure, whether successful or not, to involve multitudes in ruin: and the projectors only continue for a few half; [a] and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of [b] the holy people, all these things shall be finished.

8 And I heard, [c] but I understood not; then said I, O my Lord, [d] what shall be the end of these things?

9 And he said, [e] Go thy way, Daniel: for the words are [f] closed up and sealed till the time of the end.

10 Many [g] shall be purified, and made white, and tried; [h] but the wicked shall do wickedly: and none of the wicked shall understand; [i] but the wise shall understand.

11 And from [k] the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, [l] and * the abomination that † maketh desolate set up, there shall be [m] a thousand two hundred and ninety days.

12 [n] Blessed is he that waiteth, and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days.

V. 5—9. When the angel had finished his discourse, Daniel was led to look around him, and he saw two other angels, one on each side of the river Tigris. He saw also "upon," or rather above, "the waters of that river, "a man clothed in linen;" this was doubtless Christ our spotless High Priest; who ruleth over many people, of which sitting or standing upon waters is an emblem. One of the attending angels asked him, "How long it was to "be to the end of these wonders?" In answer to which inquiry, He lifted up both his hands to heaven, as swearing by the eternal JEHOVAH, that it would be for a time, times, and a half. This is the same period, that we before met with; (vii. 25;) and which we shall repeatedly find in the Revelation of St. John. It signifies three years and a half, or twelve hundred and sixty days. These are to be calculated from the time when the king, before prophesied of, began to scatter the power of the holy people, until that scattering shall be accomplished; for then all these things will be finished. This period must not be calculated from the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the subsequent dispersion of the Jews; for they then ceased to be the holy people: but from the time, when the anti-christian usurpers began to scatter the power of true christians, by false doctrines, persecutions, massacres, and religious wars, to the approaching period when these powers shall be subverted. It has been seen, that the imposture of Mahomet, and the papal usurpation, began about the same time; and we may allow both to be included, as a twofold attack upon the Church under the secret direction of the devil and his angels. When Daniel heard this, he found that he did not understand it: and he therefore made further inquiries respecting it; and was again reminded, that the words were to be closed, and sealed up to the time of the end.

What shall, &c.? 'Or as Mr. Mede translates the 'words, "What are these latter times, thou speakest of?" —'Be content with what has been made known unto 'thee: for the fuller explication of the prophecy is de-'ferred to the time of its accomplishment.' (Lowth.)

V. 10. During the long-continued troubles of the church, the Lord intended to carry on his work, and to purify and sanctify a great multitude, even by means of these trials: and whilst the wicked would practise their wickedness without remorse, and none of them would understand the meaning of these prophecies; they would gradually be unveiled to the wise and righteous, by the concurrent teaching of the Holy Spirit, and the accomplishment of them in Providence. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11—13. The taking away of the daily sacrifice, and the abomination that maketh desolate, seem to be expressions applied to various different events of a similar nature. When Antiochus put a stop to the temple-worship, and set up his idols, they were in some sense accomplished; and also when the Romans destroyed the temple, and terminated its worship, and left the holy city to be inhabited by idolaters: but they are here evidently applied to the establishment of idolatry and persecution within the church, by the tyranny of Antichrist. These twelve hundred and ninety days must be calculated from the same time as the three years and a half before-mentioned; and the thirty years beyond them. The subversion of the kingdom of Antichrist, and the destruction of the seat of the beast, (Rev. xviii. xix.) will probably be at the end of the twelve hundred and sixty years; thirty years more may be taken up in wholly extirpating the Antichristian powers; and the last number of thirteen hundred and thirty years, which reaches forty-five years beyond that time, may predict the complete introduction of the millennium, when the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea: and happy will they be, who wait and live to see that time. Without doubt this period is approaching, and not very far distant: though I dare not hazard an opinion about the exact time whence these years are to be dated. Daniel having received thus much information, was to prepare for death and rest in heaven, for he would stand in his lot, as a glorified saint, to witness the accomplishment of these predictions. Let any one carefully compare the terms and dates in these two concluding chapters of Daniel, with the scriptures referred to in the margin, and it is probable, that he will no longer doubt, but the prophet Daniel, and the apostle John in Revelation, spake of the same transactions. 'What an amaz-'ing prophecy is this, comprehending so many various 'events, and extending through so many successive ages; 'from the first establishment of the Persian empire, about 'five hundred and thirty years before Christ, to the ge-'neral resurrection! How much nobler and more exalted 'the sense, more important and more worthy to be known 'by men, and to be revealed by God, when taken in this 'extended view, and applied to this long and yet regular 'series of affairs, by the most easy and natural construc-'tion; than when confined and limited to the times and

'actions of Antiochus, to whom yet it cannot be recon'ciled by the most strained and unnatural interpretation!'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

Our glorious Prince and Saviour, who once appeared on earth to make atonement for our sins, and who now is at the right hand of the Father, as our Advocate to plead our cause; will be sure to stand up in behalf of his people in the extremity of their trials and temptations, and to make them triumphant over all their enemies: nor can any troubles prevent the everlasting felicity of a single person, whose name is written in the book of life. But none of our deliverances will be complete till that hour cometh, when, "all that are in the graves, shall hear the voice of "the Son of God, and shall come forth, they that have "done good, to the resurrection of life, and they that have "done evil to the resurrection of damnation." At that decisive season, when the multitude of the wicked shall not only be the objects of disdain and abhorrence to the righteous Judge of all and his saints and angels, without any mixture of compassion or mercy, but shall even loathe and despise each other; the righteous shall obtain glory, honour, immortality, and eternal life. Let us then seek wisdom and righteousness, resist temptation manfully, bear up under troubles cheerfully, and wait for a happy issue of all our conflicts and sorrows. But what special encouragement may the faithful preachers of the Gospel derive from this subject, amidst all their fatigues and difficulties, and the contempt and persecution which they encounter in this evil world! For they are truly wise, and shall shine in glory as the brightness of the firmament; and every one, whom they are the instruments of turning unto righteousness, will be an addition to their crown of glory and rejoicing in the day of Christ. Let us "not then be weary of well doing, for in due season "we shall reap, if we faint not."

V. 4—13.

If we be enabled to obtain a well grounded assurance of eternal happiness, and be diligently employed in our proper work; we may be satisfied, though a part of the sacred Scriptures should be sealed up from us: for God hath so ordered it, that some things are to be closed from our view, and reserved for the use of future generations. However, we should not be willingly ignorant of any part of revelation, but should with modesty and humility, bestow much pains to understand and explain the sacred oracles, that knowledge may be increased: and when many are thus employed, some will discover one thing, and some another, and the whole will become better understood. And may the Lord sent forth many preachers, "who may run to and fro all over the earth," to guide those who sit in darkness, into the ways of truth and righteousness!—Our Lord and Saviour, who ruleth over the raging of the waters and the madness of the people, is the sole Proprietor of this knowledge: even angels, when they desire to look down and inquire into the affairs of his Church, seek all their information from him; and he gives his servants on earth wisdom and knowledge, answerable to their occasions. We should then apply to him continually for instruction; what he communicates we should thankfully receive; but we should inquire no further into those things which he conceals. We know in general that the prevalence of his enemies, to scatter the power of his saints, hath an appointed period: and that he is continually "purifying to himself a peculiar people "zealous of good works," even when wickedness most abounds and prospers: that all the trials of believers, yea, and all their temptations too, (though they often for the moment blacken and defile them,) shall eventually combine to purify and make them white: and that when persecution stops the public administration of divine ordinances, and idolatry renders the visible Church an abomination and a desolation; yet still there is a scattered, or hidden remnant, who are wise to understand the ways of God, which none of the wicked can understand.—But glorious times approach. Happy will they be, who live to see them! yea, happy are believers at all times! they rest in God by faith now, and a rest is reserved for them in heaven at last. They may then cheerfully look forward to a dying hour; when the Lord will bid them depart in peace, for their eyes have seen, and their hearts have experienced his salvation; they may expect to rest in their happy lot in the end of their days; and in heaven to share the triumphs of the Church on earth, which they here foresaw, longed, and prayed for, but did not live to witness.

BOOK OF HOSEA.

The twelve remaining prophecies have long been considered as one book. It is thought, that St. Stephen referred to this arrangement, when, quoting a passage from Amos, he says, "As it is written in the book of the prophets:" (Acts vii. 42) And it is certain, that in the first ages of Christianity, both Jews and Christians numbered up the books of the Old Testament, according to it. This may help to show what those books were, to which Christ and his apostles referred, as The Scriptures, and The oracles of God. The writers of this part of Scripture are generally called THE MINOR PROPHETS; not that their writings were inferior in excellency or authority to the larger works of the other prophets: but merely on account of their brevity. They do not seem to be placed exactly after the order in which the prophets delivered them. Nine of them prophesied before the captivity, three prophesied after the Jews were returned from Babylon; and some of the former were as early, or more so, than the prophet Isaiah; especially Jonah, who evidently preceded all the others. As to the rest, the various schemes formed, and the different opinions held, by very learned men, and the slender grounds on which in some cases they rest their opinions, show that it is a subject of more difficulty than use. The dates affixed to each prophecy and its several parts must suffice here.

It may be supposed that these prophets, and many who wrote nothing, were eminent and useful preachers of righteousness to their own generations; and perhaps some of them did more service in their own time, than those who have left more behind them for the benefit of posterity: at least the Lord generally dispenses his gifts and services in this manner.

Hosea, whose prophecy we now enter upon, exercised his sacred office for a great many years: he predicted the captivity of the ten Tribes long before it arrived, yet he probably lived to witness its near approach. He is supposed to have been of the kingdom of Israel, though his prophecies frequently relate to Judah also. His style is remarkably concise, sententious, and unconnected, though some parts are peculiarly pathetic, animated, and sublime. His general scope was to convince his people of their exceeding sinfulness, and to warn them by the terror, and lead them by the goodness, of God to repentance. His prediction of events which soon took place, are numerous: but those relating to the state of Israel and Judah, for many ages; the conversion of the Gentiles; and the future restoration of the Jews, are peculiarly distinct and striking; they coincide with those of the other prophets; and the extraordinary fulfilment of several, both proves the divine inspiration of the writer, and gives assurance that the rest will in due time be accomplished. Considering the brevity of this prophecy, few parts of the Old Testament are more fully attested, by quotations, or clear references, in the New. (Comp. i. 10, 11. ii. 23. Rom. ix. 25, 26. 1 Pet. ii. 10.—vi. 6. Matt. ix. 13.—x. 8. Luke xxiii. 30. Rev. vi. 16.—xi. 1. Matt. ii. 15.—xiii. 14. 1 Cor. xv. 54, 55.) Very strong language has been used, by some learned men, on the corrupt state in which the original text of the minor prophets in general, and of Hosea in particular, has been sent down to us; and abundant corrections, some on but slender authority, others purely conjectural; some where they might seem to render the sense more clear, others where, to me at least, they appear to render it more obscure, have been proposed. But this method, if freely encouraged, is a desperate remedy: it tends to add to, and take from, the word of God, and to substitute the conjectures of men, in the place of his infallible oracles. In a few instances, with great caution and sobriety, on the united authority of manuscripts and versions, a slight alteration may be admissible: but in general, it is probable, that the humble, diligent, and pious student of Scripture will find, that the text as it now stands, contains in every part an important and instructive meaning. Industry, (with earnest prayer,) in endeavouring to understand the sacred oracles, in their present state, would perhaps do more to render the meaning of them intelligible, explicit, and impressive, than all the labour which is taken to correct and improve the text: and if at last, a few passages remained obscure, or ambiguous, this would by no means be of such bad consequence, as conjectural alterations, or alterations on dubious authority.

The translation of this prophecy, likewise, has been much complained of: and perhaps some passages are less exactly and clearly rendered, than usual. But it is no easy matter to give an unexceptionable version to so concise an ancient book, which is on many accounts peculiarly difficult: and it is very doubtful, whether, all things considered, a better translation could at present be made, than that which we already possess; at least such attempts, in this and other instances, do not appear to have been very successful.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. This is the general title of the book: Hosea wrote The word that came to him from the LORD. His name is the same as Joshua, or Jesus, except as these are compounded with the first syllable of the word JEHOVAH. It signifies salvation. All the kings of Judah, that succeeded each other during Hosea's ministry, are mentioned: but Jeroboam of Israel alone, under whose reign he began to prophecy; for after Jeroboam's death the affairs of Israel fell into the utmost confusion. (Notes, 2 Kings xiv. 21. xv. 8.) If we suppose, that the prophet exercised his ministry for a few of the last years of Jeroboam, and of the first of Hezekiah, we shall find that he laboured in the work nearly 70 years, and must have lived to a very great age. No information is given of the time in which he delivered any one of his predictions.

V. 2, 3. The prophet was called to enter on his prophetical office in a very remarkable manner. When he was, as it seems, a very young man, he was commanded by the Lord, to marry a wife of whoredoms, one notorious for that vice, and whose children would be considered as children of whoredoms. This was intended to be an emblem of the Lord's dealings with the idolatrous Israelites, whom he had espoused to himself. And accordingly Hosea married Gomer the daughter of Diblaim. It hath been much disputed, whether this was done in reality or in vision; or whether it were any thing more than a parable that he spake to the people. But it seems to be taking an unauthorized liberty with Scripture, to explain narrative into vision, or parable, without absolute necessity, or any intimation of it in the text. If we consider it as a reality, many difficulties remain to be obviated. It is argued that it would have been inconsistent with the prophet's character, to marry a notoriously bad woman: and therefore some have conjectured, that she was previously reformed, (as Rahab the harlot had been, before she was married to Salmon:) others imagine, that she bore a good character when the prophet married her, but afterwards became a wife of whoredoms, and her children were brought under the suspicion of being children of whoredoms: and this is more plausible than the former, which by no means accords to the thing signified. But perhaps it may be shown, that it was not unlawful or immoral for the prophet to marry a licentious woman, on such an occasion. Some restrictions were laid upon the priests in these respects, but he was not concerned in them; Gomer was an Israelite, and not included in the prohibitions of intermarrying with Gentiles. The rule in the New Testament, of believers marrying only in the Lord, was doubtless always obligatory, as to the spirit of it, in ordinary cases; because most important consequences depend on it: but, (like the laws against the marriages of near relations,) though generally and highly expedient, it cannot be deemed of immutable and indispensable obligation; for cases may be imagined, in which it must be violated, or other moral laws of God be broken. The express command of God would suffice to authorize any deviations from ordinary rules, which were not of immutable and moral obligation; and it is impossible, that he should actually command an immoral action; though he might command, what otherwise would be wrong for a man to do, as the extirpation of the Canaanites, men, women, and children. So that it might not only be lawful for the prophet thus to marry, but his bounden duty; and to bear the heavy cross that it would lay on him. As the Israelites were idolatrous in Egypt, before their national espousals to the Lord at mount Sinai, as well as afterwards; so that they were, through their successive generations unto him, as a wife of whoredoms, and children of whoredoms: it would form a more affecting picture of God's unmerited goodness and unwearied patience, and of their perverseness and ingratitude, by which they grieved, wearied him out, and dishonoured him, if we take it literally, than it we adopt any other interpretation of it. A man, who had a wife, that both before and after marriage was guilty of incontinence, would be ready to look upon her children with suspicion, and to consider them as children of whoredoms; and others would be apt to think the same: this was the case of the Lord respecting the people of Israel; and it will perhaps afterwards appear, that the conduct of the prophet exactly pictured that of God to Israel, with respect to his past, and present, and predicted future dealings, with that favoured but ungrateful nation.

V. 4, 5. (Notes, 2 Kings x. 29—31.) Gomer, the name of Hosea's wife, signifies consumption. This might in general denote the ruin of the nation for their idolatries: and the names, which God commanded the prophet to give her children referred to the different gradations, by which that ruin would come upon them.—Jezreel was the city where Jehu smote the family of Ahab: the name signifies, the seed of God, or the arm of God, or scattered by God, as seed is when sown: Jehu had executed judgment on Ahab's family, and was recompensed for that service, by the continuance of the kingdom in his family to the fourth generation. But his subsequent conduct evinced, that he was actuated by selfish motives in all that he did; the ambition, cruelty, and hypocrisy, of which he was then guilty, were to be avenged on his house, after their subsequent idolatry and iniquity had ripened them for this destruction; and then the kingdom would speedily cease from the house of Israel. This was predicted towards the close of the reign of Jeroboam the grandson of Jehu, whose son Zechariah was soon murdered by Shallum, who usurped the throne: and from that time the history of the kingdom of Israel contains littl else than conspiracies, murders, and usurpations; till it was subverted by the Assyrians, and the people were scattered of God through the various provinces of the Assyrian empire. Perhaps some fatal battle was afterwards fought in the valley of Jezreel, in which the Assyrians brake the bow, or destroyed the military force, of the kingdom of Israel.

V. 6, 7. The daughter, which Gomer next bare, has been considered as an emblem of the enfeebled state of Israel, after the fall of Jehu's family: her name signifies Not having received mercy, and implied that God would finally cast off the kingdom of Israel, as a separate people, and no more show them the special mercy that he bears to his chosen inheritance. But at the same time he promised "to have mercy on Judah, and to save them by the LORD "their God," and not by the weapons of war. Some explain this of the deliverance of Judah from the Assyrian invasion, by the miraculous destruction of Sennacherib's army: others of their return from captivity, by the Lord's powerfully inclining the heart of Cyrus to release them. But we should not lose sight of the great salvation by the LORD their God, when he was manifested in the flesh to effect by himself that spiritual redemption, of which all the temporal deliverances of his people were no more than types and shadows. Of this salvation all the prophets wrote; the Jewish nation was continued in possession of their privileges till this Horn of salvation was raised up among them. His victories were obtained, not by bow or sword, but by his precious blood and powerful grace: and he will at last save the Jews, and recover them from their present dispersions; for which purpose, they are evidently reserved from age to age a separate people, whilst the Israelites have either been incorporated among them, or among the Gentiles.

V. 8—10. Lo-ammi signifies not my people; as Israel had not sought or obtained mercy, God would no longer own them as his people; they would be left to renounce entirely his worship, and he would utterly cast them out of his special protection. Yet he would not break his promise made to their fathers: the numbers of the Israelites would still be as the sand of the sea. Vast multitudes of their tribes would be joined to the Jews, or converted along with them to Christ; and the innumerable millions of the Gentiles, that should become the children of God by faith in Jesus Christ, would be indeed the true Israel and the seed of Abraham, as united to that one Seed to whom the promises were made. So that, in the places where it had heretofore been said, that the inhabitants were not God's people, there would many be addressed as the children of the living God. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11. This may refer to the union of the Israelites with the Jews, who came up under Zerubbabel after the captivity: they were not divided as before, but appointed themselves one head, or captain and ruler over them all. Or it may relate to the conversion of the Israelites as well as the Jews to Christ, in the primitive times: or rather to that future period, when the Jews, and all the Israelites that are incorporated with them, shall gather together, and submit to Christ, as their Head of authority, direction, protection, and influence; and so come up out of the land of their captivity: for as the scattering of the people by the Lord hath been great and long; so the day of their being gathered from their dispersion shall be very glorious, which seems to be intended by "the day of Jezreel."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It would seldom be expedient, and sometimes it would not be lawful, for us to exercise all that tenderness, compassion, and liberal kindness to those, who grossly violate their relative and social engagements, which the Lord shows to us, after all our ingratitude, unfaithfulness, and misbehaviour to him: but he hath provided a method, in which to display the honour of his justice and holiness, whilst his grace abounds to the chief of sinners. We should be ready to bear any cross in our persons, or in domestic and relative life, which the Lord pleases to appoint for us. He has a right to our implicit submission; our sharpest trials are far less than our deservings; and he can make up all losses to us, and comfort us in the most disquieting circumstances. That situation may become safe and easy to us, when the Lord appoints it for us, which would have been intolerable and perilous, if we had thrust ourselves into it: and when we are obedient to God's command, we may trust our characters with him, and venture all consequences: even though we act contrary to the general sentiments of mankind in ordinary cases.—We should any of us be broken and wearied out, with half that perverseness from others, with which we try the patience and grieve the Spirit of our God: nor can any event in life sufficiently illustrate his long-suffering and mercy to his people, and their base and ungrateful conduct to him. But, though the upright soul, who loaths and mourns over his sins, may still hope in that mercy, which he is conscious of having abused; yet let the proud, hypocritical, and hardened rebel beware. His specious and hollow services will have their reward; but his pride and hypocrisy will meet with their merited punishment: and though avarice, ambition, and iniquity may for a time advance a man's family, or even promote the prosperity of a nation; yet they will at length bring down a load of vengeance, which will scatter or sink them in infamy and ruin. The Lord's mercy is infinite and everlasting towards them that fear him: but it hath its limits, in respect of impenitent sinners and guilty nations; the time approaches when he will no more have mercy on them for ever; and dreadful will be the case of those who shall not have obtained mercy, when death shall summon them to God's tribunal! But the salvation of the righteous is of the Lord: he saves them by his own mercy, truth, and power, from guilt and sin, from Satan and this present world, and from all their enemies, that they may "serve him in "righteousness and true holiness before him, all the days "of their lives;" and they need fear no dangers, who have God for their "Shield and exceeding great Reward." Though many of his professed people have been cast off, and he would no more be their God; yet the number of his true Israel can never be known. Blessed be his name, that in our land, of which it might once have been said, "Ye are not my people," it may now be said of numbers, "Ye are the children of the living God." May it be truly said of the writer, and every reader of these Observations:

Let us then join ourselves to his worshippers, and enlist under the banner of our appointed Head; that with one accord we may leave the land of our captivity, and march forward to the Canaan above; celebrating as we proceed the glory of our Redeemer, the greatness of our deliverance, our invaluable privileges, and our joyful prospect. And let us pray for the approach of that glorious day, when the scattered Jews shall gather themselves to Christ, and be again numbered amongst his seed, his true Israel; and when there shall be "one LORD and his name One," through all the nations of the earth.

" it should be said, Ye are the children of the living God;" which has been explained of the calling of the Gentiles and the dispersed Israelites into the Church; and the Jews are here exhorted to acknowledge them as brethren, and to call them Ammi, or " my people," and Ruhamah, or " having obtained mercy." They were required to treat all as brethren and sisters, who had obtained mercy, and were become God's people; and to congratulate them on their admission to this happy estate. (Marg. Ref.) It may also intimate that when Israel should be cast off from being God's peculiar people, there would still be found a remnant, to whom his servants might thus address themselves, at the time when the prophet wrote, and when the Jewish nation was rejected after the coming of Christ.—Some expositors interpret this of the general restoration of the Jewish nation; but St. Paul evidently quotes the passage referred to, as a prediction of the calling of the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2—5. While the servants of God were directed to own, as brethren, the converted Gentiles, and the restored of Israel; they were called on to plead in the name of God with their mother, or the Church and nation of Israel. When the prophets protested against idolatry, and the pious remnant separated from the idolaters, though their kings, princes, and priests, and the bulk of the nation were of that number; they then pleaded with their mother. When Christ and his apostles severely reproved the chief priests, scribes, pharisees, and the nation in general, and foretold their rejection and the calling of the Gentiles, they pleaded with their adulterous mother, and took the Lord's part against her: and by encouraging penitent publicans, harlots, Samaritans, and Gentiles, they said to their brethren, Ammi, and to their sisters, Ruhamah. It might be deemed undutiful for sons to plead against their mother; yet the honour of their God and Father on this occasion required it. She was therefore to be reminded, that the Lord no longer considered her as his wife, or himself as her Husband; and that he would proceed to execute judgment on her, unless she repented and reformed. This was expressed, by " putting away her whoredoms out of her " sight, and her adulteries from between her breasts," &c.: and it implied a command, to put away all the idols from the land, and to avoid whatever might tempt them or others to that crime; and to pull down as it were the idols that were set up in their hearts. If this were not done immediately, the Lord threatened, that he would " strip her " naked, &c.:" that is, he would deprive the people of all their honourable distinctions and desirable advantages, and reduce them to the most abject, contemptible, and miserable condition, similar to their bondage in Egypt, in the infancy of the nation; and would leave them, as in a wilderness, to perish with hunger and thirst. Nor would he show mercy to their children; for they were born of idolaters, brought up in idolatry, and even dedicated to idols: and therefore God regarded them as " children of whore- " doms." And indeed what else could be expected of them, when their mother had been so abandoned as to run into the most shameful practices? For the people in general ascribed their temporary plenty and prosperity to the bounty of their idols; and were emboldened to go on in the abominable worship of them, by abounding in every thing which they could abuse to sensuality. Thus the heathens used to worship one imaginary deity as the giver of their corn, another as the giver of their wine, or of their fruit, &c.: and in the festivals kept in honour of these idols they ran into the most shameful excesses. ' By ' lovers are meant, in the first place, the idols with which ' the Israelites committed spiritual fornication, (Jer. iii. ' 1:) and then the idolatrous nations, whose alliance they ' courted, and in order to it practised their idolatries.' (Lowth.) There seems no sufficient evidence for interpreting this chapter exclusively of the ten tribes, as many expositors do.

V. 6, 7. The Lord did not intend to cast off all the seed of Israel; and therefore, speaking of the nation in general, he declared his purpose of keeping them from sinking into universal idolatry. Whilst the infatuated harlot was bent on following after her lovers; he was resolved to make a thorn-hedge across her road, through which she could not pass without greatly tearing herself; nay, to build a wall which she could not get over to find her paths. So that, though she attempted to follow her lovers, she should not overtake them, &c. That is, the Lord would so punish his people by heavy judgments, as to preserve them from total idolatry; so that whilst numbers would perish, a remnant would be cured of that sin. When the ten tribes were carried into Assyria and the Jews to Babylon, neither their idols nor their idolatrous allies could do them any good; and not being able to overtake them, or to find protection and deliverance from them; they would be convinced of their folly, in forsaking the living God for dead idols, their first Husband, for these worthless lovers; and so coming to themselves, they would be led to return home, to repent, to seek reconciliation, and re-admission to their former privileges. This seems immediately to predict the restoration of the Jews and many Israelites with them, from the Babylonish captivity, when they were effectually cured of gross idolatry: but the future conversion of the nation may also be intended.

V. 8, 9. The people did not understand, consider, or acknowledge, that the Lord gave them all their temporal mercies; and this forgetfulness exposed them to be tempted to abuse them in sacrifices, oblations, or vestments, prepared for Baal, and other idols. To convince them of this, the Lord intended to resume his grant; it had been but a loan to them, which he would recover by distraining upon them for it, seeing they had thus most evidently forfeited it. 'At the very season when she expects to receive the 'fruits of the earth, her enemies shall invade her and de-'stroy them.' (Lowth.)

V. 10—13. God himself determined to cause all the nations, whose idols Israel had worshipped, to witness their wickedness and shame; nor should any deliver them from deserved punishment. The Israelites observed festivals in honour of their idols: yet they seem to have paid regard to some of those appointed in the law, and to have made them seasons of carnal mirth and sensual indulgence; and the Jews came from the worship of idols, to celebrate them at the temple, (Jer. vii. 9, 10.) But the Lord would turn their mirth into mourning; when by his desolating judgments he destroyed all their vines and fig-trees, which they vainly supposed were given them by their idols, as a recompense for worshipping them. Thus he would visit on the nation the sins of all those days and years, during which they had worshipped Baalim, or idols; when they had resembled an adulteress, that adorns herself with her most costly attire at the expense of her injured husband, that she may be the more agreeable to her vile paramours: for they were entirely forgetful of the authority of God and their obligations to him. Jehu had "destroyed Baal out of Israel;" but the people had substituted other idols in his place; and so had filled up the measure of their fathers' crimes. It is probable, that the idolaters adorned themselves with great care, as well as wore peculiar garments, when worshipping their idols, (2 Kings x. 22.) 'By showing how harlots trim them-'selves to please others, he declareth that superstitious 'idolaters set a great part of their religion in decking 'themselves on their holy days.'

V. 14—17. The preceding prophecies were fulfilled in the captivities of Israel and Judah, (and perhaps in the present dispersion of the Jews.) But when these judgments had prepared the way, the Lord intended to deal with them in a more gentle manner. He would allure, or persuade, them to return to him, by invitations and hopes of reconciliation and felicity: he would thus draw them off from carnal pleasures and confidences, and make all their former delusions to vanish: so that they would see themselves in a barren wilderness, and exposed to inevitable ruin, except the Lord helped them; as was the case with their fathers in the wilderness: and when they should thus be reduced to despair of help, he would speak comfortably to them, and encourage them to trust in his mercy, grace, and providence. Thus he would, from that destitute and forlorn condition, restore them to the possession of their former privileges; as if fruitful vineyards were suddenly given in a barren wilderness: and the valley of Achor, or Trouble, (where Achan was stoned,) in which Israel had fallen before his enemies, would be for a door of hope; preparing them for mercy, by humbling them and leading them to renounce their idols, and seek help from God alone. This valley was also one of the first acquisitions of Israel in Canaan, and an encouraging earnest of their possessing the whole. Thus being delivered from all their enemies and sorrows, they would sing praises with joyful hearts, as their fathers had done before, when they saw the Egyptians dead upon the sea shore. From that time they would be more cordially attached to the Lord than ever: no longer calling him Baali, or my Lord and Master, alluding to the authority, rather than the affection of a husband; but Ishi, which is the language of cordial affection, in a woman speaking to her husband. For, the abuse of the word Baalim in the worship of their idols should lead to a total disuse of it, so that it should no more be remembered or employed by them. (Marg. Ref.) This may primarily foretel their restoration from the Babylonish captivity: yet it may also be applied to the conversion of the Jews and Israelites to Christ, in the apostolic days, and to the future conversion of that nation. Perhaps the incarnation of Christ may be referred to, in the name here mentioned, Ishi, My Husband, or literally Man. (Is. xxxii. 1, 2.)

V. 18—20. When the people were weaned from idols, and attached in love and faithfulness to the worship of the Lord; he would then not only renew his covenant with them, but he would make a covenant in their behalf with the beasts of the field, &c.; that is, he would take care that no creature should do them any harm, and that all should concur in doing them good. Their land was occupied by the beasts of the field, during the captivity, when it had been desolated by war: but he would afterwards rid the country of these creatures, and defend it from invaders, and make it a quiet and secure habitation for them. Nay, he would betroth them to himself, as their Husband, their kind Friend, Protector, and Companion, in the most solemn and public manner: he would engage the honour of his righteousness, wisdom, loving-kindness, mercy, and truth, for their security; employ these attributes for their good, and glorify himself in his dealings with them; he would communicate to them "wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption;" he would enrich, ennoble, adorn, and rejoice them, with all the comforts and blessings of the marriage-relation; and perform all his precious promises to them: and thus he would cause them to know him as their Lord and God. —This can only be understood, in its highest sense, of the conversion of the Jews to Christ; and of the inestimable blessings and privileges of the spiritual Israel, of all true believers, to which they are admitted by faith in Christ, and union with him; and a participation of his righteousness, unsearchable riches, and mediatorial blessings.

Know, &c. 'Thou shalt find that I am, and will be, "a gracious Lord unto thee.'" (Bp. Hall.)

V. 21—23. When this happy change should take place in Israel's condition, that had before been so desolate and perilous, all things in heaven and earth would contribute to their advantage. This is represented in very bold figurative language: the heavens are introduced as beseeching the Lord to fill their clouds with water to water the land, and he promises to hear them: the earth is represented as calling on the heavens to pour down rain, and they hear; the fruits of the ground call also on the earth to furnish them with supplies, and are heard; and these again regard the desires and wants of Jezreel, or that people, who had been the seed of God, yet by him scattered, but are now to be gathered to him. All nature seems here alive and active in helping the converted Jews: and the supply of their spiritual wants, in answer to the prayers of the people and ministers of Christ, and through the ordinances of his appointment, may also be thus typified. The dispersion of the Jews would at length prove like the scattering of seed upon the earth, in order to a large increase; for God would, through them, or by means of his believing people, who are dispersed as seed in the earth,) "have mercy on them, who had not obtained "mercy," and gather those among his people, that had not before owned him as their God. This is applied by the apostles to the conversion both of Jews and Gentiles to Christ: and we may suppose, that the latter part of the chapter refers to that restoration of Israel, which shall be as life from the dead to the nations of the earth. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

We should own and love all those as brethren, whom the Lord appears to have put among his children: and encourage them with the consideration, that they have obtained mercy, and are become the people of God. But the ministers of Christ must not connive at the abuses or crimes of that religious community, which claims the authority and stands in the relation to them, of a mother: for the glory of God, and the interests of his truth and righteousness should be far nearer to our hearts, than the credit or favour of our fellow-creatures, however related to us or advanced above us. And indeed every Christian ought by his example, profession, and conversation, to protest against the superstitions, errors, or abuses of that Church to which he belongs, or from which he hath been brought forth: for eminently pious persons are sometimes raised up within those corrupt Churches, which God is about to give up to destruction; on purpose to bear testimony against them, and call men to repentance, that a remnant may be preserved or rescued from the contagion that hath infected the rest. If men would escape sin and condemnation, they must put all occasions of evil out of sight, repress the rising sinful inclinations of the heart, and shun whatever may be a temptation to them, or render them temptations to others. Impenitent sinners will soon be stripped of all their abused advantages and worldly prosperity, and exposed to the utmost shame, contempt, and misery: and they who have trained up their children in impiety, iniquity, or false religion, cannot reasonably expect, that God will confer spiritual blessings upon them. Such men often ascribe their temporal enjoyments to their sins or idols, and thus are emboldened to more iniquity; whereas the Lord "giveth us all things richly to enjoy," and the devil tempts men to consume them upon their lusts.—When we are infatuated by the violence of any headstrong passion, or harassing temptation, and bent upon the gratification of our depraved inclinations; it is a special mercy to have our way hedged up with thorns, or closed by some unsurmountable wall, that we may not be able to overtake our beloved idols and pleasures: and if pain, sickness, or calamity keep us from sin, we should be thankful for it.—Every gracious soul will habitually prefer suffering to sin: and it is even a mercy to ungodly men to be kept by severe affliction from "treasuring up wrath against the day of "wrath." But if unsurmountable obstructions and inextricable difficulties, not only disable them for a time from finding any pleasure in their sins, or from committing them; but are the means at length of bringing them to themselves, to perceive and lament their folly in departing from God, and to return to him, humbly seeking forgiveness and salvation; the mercy is inestimably precious. When professors of the Gospel depart from the ways of God, and meet with no such thorn-hedges and strong walls to impede their sinful course, and to bring them back ashamed and humbled, their case looks very dark: but if backsliders are by such discipline led to say, 'I will go, 'and return to the Lord, that I may again have the com-'fort of communion with him, and of my relation to him; 'for then it was far better with me than now;' we should encourage and exhort them to decision in so doing. If men forget or consider not, that their comforts come from God, and so they use them in a sinful manner; he will often in mercy take them away, to bring the offenders to reflect on their folly and danger. When he turns unjust stewards out of their stewardship, and calls them to give an account of it, none of their friends or idols can deliver them out of his hand; and all shall see, and be constrained to confess, that they deserve their ignominy and misery.—In this our land of affluence and abundance, what numbers prepare their corn, wine, oil, gold, and silver for Baal, by their excess, luxury, and ostentation! And often the behaviour of those that are employed in gathering in the precious fruits of the earth, seems to be an attempt to revive the bacchanalian riots of ancient idolaters. Men, who live in allowed sin, and then pretend to rejoice in God's ordinances, or on religious festivals; (as many ungodly persons do in their carnal way of celebrating Christmas, &c.) are most awfully deceived: all such rejoicing is vain, and tends to weeping and gnashing of teeth.

V. 14—23.

When sinners seem ripe for vengeance, the Lord sometimes shows his sovereign grace, in having mercy on them. To bring them to repentance, he both drives them from their sins by his terrors and judgments, and allures them by discoveries of his love, and hopes of acceptance and happiness. He often deprives them of all hope and comfort in the world and from themselves; and when their humiliation, terrors, and sorrows tend to desperation, he speaks comfortably to their hearts. He brings them into a desolate wilderness, where no joy can be found, except from his mercy; and thence he gives them all the provisions of his grace, and the comforts and privileges of his salvation. He makes the valley of deep dejection and extreme trouble, to be a door of hope to them; and drives them to despair of earthly joy, and help from themselves; that being shut out from every other door, they may knock at mercy's gate until it be opened. Then their terrors and sorrows are terminated; he brings them out of the horrible pit, and puts a new song into their mouths, and they sing, "O Lord, I will praise thee; though thou wast angry "with me, yet thine anger is turned away, and thou

"comfortest me: behold God is become my Salvation, I "will trust, and not be afraid." Though the Lord loses none of his authority by his condescending love to us; yet his awful majesty thus becomes the object of our confidence and delight: and believers are enabled to expect all that tenderness and kindness from their holy God, which a beloved wife can expect from the most affectionate husband, yea, far more. But he saves them from their idols, and sets them against their sins, and disposes them to walk before him in newness of life; as well as gives them the joy of his favour and salvation. If his new covenant be made with us, he will make all things to work together for our good, and every creature shall help us: for all things are ours, even death itself; and we may lie down with peace and security in his clay-cold bed, having committed our spirit into the Redeemer's hands. Happy then are they, who are thus betrothed to the Lord, in righteousness, judgment, loving-kindness, mercies, and faithfulness! though in themselves poor and polluted, weak and foolish; yet in him they have wisdom, strength, and righteousness, and they are enriched, ennobled, arrayed with garments of salvation, and made most blessed for evermore. Even the vilest of transgressors are now invited to seek, and encouraged to hope for, union with the Lord of life and glory, in this honourable and endeared relation; nor can too much be expected from his grace, who shed his precious blood for rebels and enemies. Let us then seek an interest in these blessings, compared with which all others are worthless: let us remember, that we are sown in the earth as seed, that in our several places we may conduce to the conversion of our fellow sinners: that they may seek and obtain mercy, who had not obtained mercy; and that they may say to the Lord, "Thou art my God," who have been strangers and enemies. Let us keep this object in view in all our actions and our whole conversation; and let us continually pour out our supplications for ourselves and all around us, to God, who will "give grace and "glory, and withhold no good thing from those that walk "uprightly."

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—3. Some interpret this, as a vision, or parable which the prophet spake to the people: but they who consider it as a fact, have some hesitation in deciding, whether it related to Hosea's former wife, or to another woman on whom he was to fix his affections. It seems, however, most probable, that it is the continuation and conclusion of the prophet's account of the transaction, with which his prophetical office began; and which was a picture of the Lord's dealing with Israel. He had married a woman of bad character, and had treated her with affection and kindness; yet she afterwards became an adulteress and departed from him. She had been beloved of her friend and husband, but proved unfaithful: yet he continued to love her; and he was directed to go and show his love by his conduct towards her. Instead of a public prosecution or a private divorce, he went with overtures of reconciliation, and only required that she would remain in a state of separation from him for many days, a competent time to evince the sincerity of her repentance; and that she would no more renew her adulteries, but reserve herself for him: and then he promised to consider himself as her husband, and at length to take her back to him. The money and the barley, with which he bought her to him, accorded to the customs of those times, when they often gave dowries for, instead of receiving them with, their wives. This implied, that the marriage had been virtually dissolved by her adulteries: and perhaps it served, or was intended, for her maintenance during the days of her seclusion, and to keep her from the temptation of becoming a harlot for subsistence. And the small sum of money, (about 11. 7*s*. 6;) and the coarseness of the provisions, being barley, not wheat, might denote the disgraced and abject condition, to which her sin had reduced her; and might intimate, that she ought to submit to present inconveniences, and wait patiently the time of being restored to favour. We may conclude from the things signified by this transaction, that she submitted to the terms, was received again by the prophet, and behaved better afterwards. For this was "according to the love "of the LORD for the children of Israel."—Some interpret this almost wholly of the kingdom of Israel: but the prophecy seems to require us to understand it of the whole people descended from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. They had been espoused to the Lord in the wilderness, notwithstanding their idolatries in Egypt: and yet, after all the displays of his love to them through their successive generations, they were always prone to fix their eyes on base idols: this was adultery, a violation of their marriage-covenant. They "also loved flagons of wine," they were attached to idol-worship, because in it they gave unbridled license to their sensual appetites. But the Lord still had love for the nation, and though he meant to deprive them of their privileges, exclude them from his Church for many days, and to debase and reduce them to great distress: yet they would still subsist as a distinct people, and at length be anew betrothed to him, and reinstated in his favour and the full enjoyment of their privileges. 'The words 'which our translation renders "flagons of wine," may 'be translated "cakes made of grapes."—Such were 'the cakes, probably, which the Jews offered to the queen 'of heaven. (Jer. vii. 18. xliv. 19.) The expression 'signifies in general, those entertainments, which they were 'partakers of, in the idol-temples.' (Lowth.)

V. 4, 5. The kingdom of Israel was soon after this entirely ruined, and the people were incorporated, either with the Jews, or the nations among whom they resided; and have had neither king, prince, priest, sacrifice, nor religious establishment, from that day to this. The Jews remained for several years without these advantages, during the Babylonish captivity; yet their civil and religious constitution was again restored. But since the rejection of that nation at the introduction of Christianity, and the destruction of their city and temple by the Romans; they have continued to this time, for much above seventeen hundred years, without king or prince of their own nation; and without priest and sacrifice, or any thing substituted in the place of the temple-worship: and, (what is still more remarkable,) they have also remained without an image, ephod, or teraphim, without any of those idolatrous observances and apparatus, to which they were so generally attached when this prophecy was uttered!—'From the 'time of the destruction of Jerusalem by Vespasian to 'this day;—they have had no—civil government of their 'own; but live every where as so many exiles, only upon 'sufferance; they have had neither priests nor sacrifice, 'their temple being destroyed, where only they were to 'offer sacrifice. And yet the want of a place, where to 'perform the most solemn part of their public worship, 'does not tempt them to idolatry,—which was the epide-'mical sin of their forefathers.' (Lowth.)—This is surely a most astonishing prophecy, of events directly contrary to all human probability; yet undeniably taking place, not on a particular occasion, or for a short time, but through very many revolving centuries! How could Hosea have foreseen this, had not God inspired him? And does not this demonstrate, (in the only way by which such things can be demonstrated,) the divine inspiration of this prophecy, and of those by whom it is quoted? (Marg. Ref.) It was also predicted, that afterwards they should return, (from their state of rejection and unbelief,) "and seek the "LORD their God and David their king." This even their own writers explain of the promised Messiah, and doubtless it foretold their future conversion to Christ; for which they are evidently preserved a separate people, neither a part of the true Church, nor yet given up to spiritual adultery; but put aside on a separate scanty maintenance, in a debased condition, for a long time, (like Hosea's wife,) to be at length received to favour again. It is added, "they shall fear the LORD and his goodness:" the discovery which these events shall make of the Lord's goodness, and of his unmerited kindness and mercy to them in Christ Jesus, will fill them with reverential awe of him and a fear of offending so kind a Friend, and will fix their hearts in the spiritual worship of him and conscientious obedience to his commandments. This would be in the latter days under the Gospel-dispensation, at that approaching period, when they shall be converted to Christ, and gathered from their present dispersions. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When we consider the ingratitude and folly even of believers, their frequent hankerings after, and idolatrous attachment to, worldly objects and sensual gratifications; which is proportionably an unfaithfulness to God and a departure from him: we shall admire his persevering love to them, almost as much as his condescension and compassion to sinners, in the glorious salvation provided for them, and the price with which it was purchased. And as far as consists with other duties, we should copy his example in our readiness to forgive, and be reconciled to those who have most ungratefully and grossly injured us. —The dislike of men to true religion arises from their preference of sensual to spiritual pleasures: they therefore love an object and a form of worship, which allow them to indulge, instead of requiring them to mortify their lusts. But he will cure the objects of his special love of these base propensities; he will rebuke, disgrace, and afflict them for their sins; he will unite his overtures of reconciliation and tokens of love with various humiliating dispensations; he will bring them to repentance, to submit to correction, to separate from sin and worldly idols, and patiently to wait for him; and when they are thus willing to reserve themselves for him alone, he will give himself to them as their God and Portion. The objects of his special love are often left, for a time, in a state of humiliating desertion, without any comfortable communion with him, in order to prove their faith and patience; many of them live a great while in an unconverted state; yet are they restrained from such crimes as would utterly ruin them, or prevent them from filling up their appointed stations in the Church. In due season they are brought to seek the Lord, to trust in the divine Saviour, and to rejoice in his holy comfort. And though their first fear of God arise from a view of his terrible holy majesty, and his righteous and powerful vengeance: yet the discovery of his goodness and his love to sinners through Jesus Christ, and the experience of his mercy and grace, sweetly lead their hearts to a filial reverence of so kind and glorious a friend and Father; to an habitual fear of offending and dishonouring him; a dread of his frown and correcting rod, and an adoring awe of him, when they present their worship and services before him. May we, who live in these latter days, thus fear the LORD and his goodness; and may both Jews and Gentiles thus seek and worship the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

CHAP. IV.

God denounces judgments on Israel, for their impieties and iniquities, 1—5. He exposes the ignorance and wickedness of the priests, and determines to reject them, 6—11. To punish the idolatry and profligacy of the people, he will leave their wives and daughters to commit lewdness, without present punishment, 12—14. He warns Judah not to imitate Israel's crimes, which are further reproved, 15—19.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. Hosea is here supposed by expositors in general, to address the kingdom of Israel exclusively. And perhaps he spake immediately to those of the ten tribes, as living among them; yet his reproofs and exhortations were so framed, as to suit the case of the Jews also when they came into their hands. The former chapters seem to have formed one general subject, consisting of several messages delivered to the people, when at God's command he married Gomer; when her children were born and named; when she departed from him: and when he proposed to her terms of reconciliation. But he here began to speak to them in direct language, concerning their immoralities and idolatries. The children of Israel, or the whole family of Jacob, are called upon to hear the word of God, who had a controversy with all the inhabitants of the promised land; for though he meant first to proceed against Israel, Judah would not escape, without repentance and entire reformation. The ground of this controversy was, "because there was no truth, mercy, or "knowledge of God in the land;" there was hardly any sincerity, veracity, or fidelity to be found amongst them; they were dissemblers in religion, and they were deceivers and impostors in their commerce with each other. As there was no honesty among them, it could scarcely be expected there should be any mercy, or compassion and kindness to the poor and afflicted; and in fact they were cruel and selfish extortioners and oppressors of the poor; and they neither knew the character of God, nor his truth or will, so as to be influenced by it, to piety, justice, or charity. But their desperate inward wickedness broke out into multiplied and aggravated perjuries, blasphemies, lies, murders, thefts, and adulteries; the whole body politic was become like one putrid ulcer, or bleeding cancer, or many all running into one. Especially the whole land was full of murders, which were committed in the conspiracies of one usurper against another, in which the adherents of each slaughtered ruler were cut off by the victorious party in great numbers, one company after another. Therefore the most distressing calamities were coming on the land, which would reduce all the inhabitants to the extremest miseries, and end in its total desolation, till neither beasts, fowls, nor fishes were left. These are figurative expressions denoting the entire destruction or dispersion of all the people.

V. 4, 5. "Yet no man contendeth; and no man re-"proveth." 'This is a natural rendering, and gives a very 'usual sense to the Hebrew future.' (Bp. Newcombe.)—While wickedness of all kinds was openly committed; there was no one either magistrate, or priest, or prophet, who protested against it, or steadily opposed it. According to our version the words imply, that the case was desperate; all were too wicked to be employed as reprovers, or too proud and obstinate to endure reproof. Nay, they were ready to turn against and rend their reprovers, even when authorized by God himself; being of the spirit of Korah and his company, when they strove against Aaron the priest of the Lord; or like Joash king of Judah, who stoned Zechariah the priest, the son of his benefactor Jehoiada, when he reproved him for his sins. (2 Chr. xxiv.) Some object to this interpretation, because it could not be a crime to contend with idolatrous priests: but the conduct of Israel towards the prophets of God, and others who reproved them, might resemble that of such as contended with his priests. They would therefore fall in the approaching day of vengeance, or when they thought themselves most secure; and the ruin of their false prophets would be like that of those who are surprised with calamity in the night, when the terror and distress are more affecting than in the day-time: yea, the Lord would slay the mother, as well as the children; the whole constitution of the Church and nation, as well as individual Israelites, or Samaria the capital of Israel. 'It was a capital offence 'by the law, for any to behave themselves in a presumptuous manner against the injunctions of the priests.'—(Deut. xvii. 12.) (Lowth.) 'If thou fallest in the day, 'the prophets shall not be long after thee; they shall fall 'in the night; and I will destroy the very Church and 'kingdom, whereto thou appertainest.' (Bp. Hall.)

6 [a] My people are * destroyed [o] for lack of knowledge: [p] because thou hast rejected knowledge, [q] I will also reject thee, that thou shalt be no priest to me: [r] seeing thou hast forgotten the law of thy God, [s] I will also forget thy children.

7 As [t] they were increased, so they sinned against me: [u] therefore will I change their glory into shame.

8 They [x] eat up the sin of my people, and they † set their [y] heart on their iniquity.

9 And there shall be, [z] like people, like priest: and I will ‡ punish them for their ways, and ◊ reward them their doings.

10 For [a] they shall eat, and not have enough: [b] they shall commit whoredom, and shall not increase, because they have [c] left off to take heed to the LORD.

11 Whoredom and wine, and new wine [d] take away the heart.

12 ¶ My people [e] ask counsel at their stocks, and their staff declareth unto them. [f] For the spirit of whoredoms hath caused them to err, and they have [g] gone a whoring from under their God.

13 They [h] sacrifice upon the tops of the mountains, and burn incense upon the hills, under oaks, and poplars, and elms, because the shadow thereof is good: [i] therefore your daughters shall commit whoredom, and your spouses shall commit adultery.

14 ‖ I will not [k] punish your daughters when they commit whoredom, nor your spouses when they commit adultery: for themselves are separated with whores, [l] and they sacrifice with harlots: [m] therefore the people that doth not understand shall * fall.

V. 6. The professed worshippers of JEHOVAH were perishing in the most entire ignorance of true religion: this was in great measure the fault of the priests and teachers, who utterly neglected their duty, and indeed were incapable of performing it. The whole company of priests seem to be here addressed as one person: as he had despised and rejected knowledge, and wilfully forgotten the word of God; therefore God would reject him and take no care of his posterity. We cannot suppose that this was exclusively addressed to the priests of the golden calves, and other priests in Israel, whom God had never acknowledged: but it must, in part at least, be spoken of the family of Aaron, whom he had appointed to the priesthood, but would at length reject for their ignorance and wickedness. Some of these might reside in Israel, but most of them were in Judah, which must therefore be here included.

V. 7—11. In proportion as the priests increased in numbers and prosperity, they grew notorious for wickedness: the Lord would therefore render the honour, which had been conferred on them, an occasion of their deeper disgrace; by exposing their crimes and inflicting ignominious punishments upon them. They did not attempt to reform the people, but were well pleased to have the sin-offerings multiplied: for they feasted on the flesh, and had many perquisites from them; and they therefore delighted in the iniquity of the people as increasing their incomes.—Thus absolutions, indulgences, and dispensations have long enriched the Romish clergy; and spiritual courts have prosecuted such offenders, as could afford to pay fines and fees, apparently for no other reason; and many such things have been, and are, perpetrated by the professed ministers of religion! As these priests were the patterns of the people in their crimes, they would be involved with them in punishment, without distinction. At length they would be reduced to pinching famine and unsatisfied hunger; their multiplying of wives and concubines, (contrary to the original law of marriage,) and their other scandalous lewdness, would prevent the increase of their families: and seeing they had left off to take heed to the Lord, manifold evils would come upon them. This shows, that the priests of Aaron's family were chiefly intended: for the priests of the calves, and those of Baal, had not, at any time, taken heed to the Lord. Indeed the whoredom and intemperance both of priests and people deprived them of understanding and judgment, and rendered their hearts and consciences unfeeling, and utterly unfit for any thing good. 'The 'people's sins deserved to be punished with such priests; 'and such priests have helped to make the people thus 'wicked.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 12—14. The professed worshippers of JEHOVAH were so infatuated by their indulgences and idolatrous practices, that they preferred consulting their wooden images, to inquiring of God by his word, his prophets, or the high-priest; and they even divined by means of their staves, in some superstitious manner: being utterly given up to idols, and alienated from God. 'Because they take away God's 'honour, and give it to idols: therefore he will give them 'up to their lusts to dishonour their own bodies.' (Rom. i. 28.) They therefore preferred the mountains and groves, where the idols were worshipped, to his temple; because they afforded an agreeable shade and secret recesses, for their abominable impurities. To punish these enormities the Lord determined to leave their daughters and wives to disgrace and to distress them, by committing whoredom and adultery: nor would he inflict on them any immediate judgment for these crimes; which would eventually embolden them to proceed, and others to imitate them, and so to become the scourges of their idolatrous fathers and husbands. And indeed this would be the natural consequence of their crimes: for themselves, (the original is masculine;) though fathers and husbands, separated from their families, to associate with abandoned harlots, even with such as were initiated, or consecrated, to be priestesses of their abominable idols, and prostitutes to their worshippers. Thus they set their wives and daughters an example of the vilest licentiousness, even in religion; and did what they could to corrupt their principles and morals! And a people, that had become thus besotted and infatuated, notwithstanding all their religious advantages, could not long escape destruction. The marginal references show, that many of the same charges were brought by the prophets against Judah, though Israel is here supposed to be principally intended.

V. 15. Here Israel and Judah are separately addressed. The former where wholly given up to idolatry and iniquity: but let not Judah thus offend; they yet have many advantages, and from them the Messiah was to arise. But if the Jews meant to avoid the crimes and ruin of Israel, let them not come near the places where idolatry was practised; Gilgal had been in many instances peculiarly distinguished; but it was become notorious for idolatry. (Marg. Ref.) Beth-aven was the same as Bethel; it had been the house of God, but it was at that time the house of vanity, for so Beth-aven signifies. Neither let them dare to swear by the name of JEHOVAH whilst worshipping their idols, for he abhorred such a coalition: or before the calves, as if they had represented him. 'God complaineth that Judah is infected, and willeth them—to return 'in time.'

V. 16—19. Israel was become utterly intractable, and obstinate in rebellion; like a refractory heifer, that hangs back and will not draw in the yoke. The Lord therefore intended to disperse them throughout the Assyrian empire, where they would be as much exposed to injury and violence, as a single deserted lamb in a large wilderness to the wild beasts. Ephraim, or the kingdom of Israel, was incurably devoted to idols; and the people should no more be molested by the unwelcome warnings of prophets, or other means of reformation, but be let alone to ripen for destruction. "He, (Ephraim,) is gone after their wine." "He is gone after the wine or banquet of idols." (Bp. Newcombe.) Or, he is loathsome through drunkenness. The people were continually given up to whoredom, corporal and spiritual: their rulers were shamefully corrupt, and showed evidently their love of bribes, even demanding them of the people, as the price of deciding in their favour: and therefore they would be hurried into captivity, as by a furious irresistible tempest; and then they would be ashamed of depending on their idolatrous or hypocritical sacrifices.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—11.

The Lord has a controversy with us on account of our sins; and if he contend, either in judgment or in battle, he will overcome. It is therefore our interest as well as duty, to submit and humble ourselves before him. Dreadful is the case of that land, which being favoured with the oracles of God, yet remains devoid of truth, mercy, and piety, and abounds in gross immoralities. We hope this is not absolutely the case with our country: yet we cannot but perceive, that many of these reproofs are too applicable to our national character: our distempered constitution, (as to religion and morality,) breaks out most grievously, by perjuries, profaneness, falsehood, murders, thefts, and shameful adulteries and licentiousness: and the additional prevalence of avowed infidelity and irreligion, renders the nation as one continued leprosy; except as the Lord hath yet reserved to himself a despised remnant of another character. He, however, hath doubtless a controversy with the inhabitants of this favoured land; and what mourning, and desolating judgments he may see good to bring upon us, we cannot tell. Yet there is encouragement for us to protest and strive against sin, and to reprove transgressors: and though many prove refractory and incorrigible, and revile those that speak to them by the authority of God; thus exposing themselves to swift and sudden destruction, with their flattering teachers and the societies to which they belong; yet others are found more teachable. But before we venture to reprove others, it behooves us to inquire, whether the reproved persons may not retort on us "Physician heal thyself?" and surely a beam in our own eye will incapacitate us for taking a mote from our brother's eye: we must not, however, be discouraged by lamented imperfections from so good a work, provided we be not conscious of any allowed wickedness. But, alas, what multitudes, even in this enlightened land, are perishing for lack of the knowledge of God, of his law, his Gospel, and of their own state, interest, and duty! —Ignorance only can be the parent of superstition or enthusiasm; without divine illumination the heart cannot be good, and the ministry of the word is the grand means of that illumination. When the professed teachers of Christianity therefore reject knowledge, and forget the word of God, to pursue other studies, pleasures, or interests, the Lord will reject them, and pour contempt on their families also. The wealth and temporal grandeur of the clergy hath commonly proved an inlet to their increasing iniquity; and their glory in this sense hath proved their shame. At all times this sacred function is a reproach to him, who is a scandal to it; and his honourable office renders him doubly contemptible. Too many of the clergy regard nothing but the emoluments of their office; they are not grieved at the sins of their people, provided they regularly pay their dues; and the increase of their livings pleases them more than the spiritual good of their flocks. Thus they, as it were, feast on the sins of the people; and leave them unmolested in their evil courses, that they may have less trouble in collecting their dues. For priest and people, being both of the same nature, are liable to commit the same crimes, and incur the same condemnation; except as the same offences are more heinous, and will be more severely punished in the former than in the latter.—Abused wealth tends to poverty, and avarice to disgrace and ruin: and when the clergy leave off to take heed to the Lord, no wonder they are left by him to disgrace themselves by the most scandalous excesses. Sensual lusts stupify the understanding, harden the heart, and sear the conscience: how then can they who indulge in them, be fitted for the weighty and holy work of the ministry, or indeed for any thing important and useful?

V. 12—19.

They who "like not to retain God in their knowledge," are often given up to strong delusions, and left to lead others into the same judicial infatuation. Thus they train up their families, by example, influence, and sophistry, in error and impiety, which always tend to vice and immorality. But how can they who are unfaithful to God, expect their wives and children to be faithful to them? Or how can they expect others to maintain their chastity, while notoriously guilty of lewdness in their own conduct? In this way men prepare scourges for themselves, and vice and misery are diffused through whole cities and communities. Let us then watch against all approaches to those abuses, which have gradually led to greater impiety; and keep our religious worship wholly free from all mixture of superstition and sensual indulgence. Whilst sinners obstinately reject the easy yoke of Christ, they are bringing down the heavy load of his vengeance upon themselves: and when they have proceeded to a certain degree of hardness and determination in their crimes; the Lord says "Let them alone:" then they receive no more warnings, feel no more convictions, are visited with no more corrections, or are left to despise them; their conscience lies dormant, and the Spirit of God strives no more with them. From the brink of this precipice may we be kept at the greatest distance! God will abhor the sacrifices and services of those who neglect honesty in their dealings: and when magistrates and rulers love to be bribed to pervert justice, it is not only most shameful and abominable, but it is a grievous symptom of approaching national judgments. And when the wrath of God, like an impetuous tempest shall hurry sinners into everlasting ruin; they will be as much ashamed of their pharisaical or hypocritical services, as of their open impieties and iniquities.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. These idolatrous priests, and the courtiers and servants of the king of Israel, with himself at the head of them, were warned to expect the speedy approach of the judgment of God against them: because they had bestowed as much pains, and used as much art, to entangle the people in idolatry to their ruin, as the fowler employed in spreading snares and nets upon the mountains to take the birds. They doubtless used arguments, persuasions, flatteries, menaces, and persecutions, to induce them to conform to the established worship of the golden calves, or of Baal. Some think, that they also set spies to watch that none of the people went up to worship at Jerusalem, in order to ensnare and punish them. These apostates from God's worship were very deep, designing, and crafty, as well as cruel, in promoting the persecution and murder of those who adhered to God, or opposed them: though the Lord, by his prophets and in his providence, frequently and sharply rebuked and chastised them for their crimes.

V. 3, 4. Ephraim, the principal tribe in the kingdom of Israel, is frequently, by a figure of speech, put for the whole. The Lord knew, not only that the Israelites had revolted from him and polluted themselves with idols; but also, that they were so attached to these abominations, and so alienated from him, that they were not at all disposed to "repent and turn to him, and do works meet for "repentance."

6 They shall [r] go with their flocks and with their herds to seek the LORD; but [s] they shall not find him: [t] he hath withdrawn himself from them.

7 They have [u] dealt treacherously against the LORD; for they have [x] begotten strange children: now shall [y] a month devour them with their portions.

8 [z] Blow ye the cornet in [a] Gibeah, and the trumpet in [b] Ramah: cry aloud at [c] Beth-aven, [d] after thee, O Benjamin.

9 [e] Ephraim shall be desolate in the day of rebuke: among the tribes of Israel [f] have I made known that which shall surely be.

10 The [g] princes of Judah were like them that [h] remove the bound: therefore I will pour out my wrath upon them [i] like water.

11 Ephraim is [k] oppressed and broken in judgment, because [l] he willingly walked after the commandment.

12 Therefore will I be unto Ephraim [m] as a moth, and to the house of Judah [n] as * rottenness.

13 When Ephraim saw his sickness, and Judah saw [o] his wound, then [p] went Ephraim to the Assyrian, and sent to † king Jareb: [q] yet could he not heal you, nor cure you of your wound.

14 For I will be unto Ephraim [r] as a lion, and as a young lion to the house of Judah: I, even I, [s] will tear and go away; I will take away, and [t] none shall rescue him.

15 I will go and [u] return to my place, [x] till they ‡ acknowledge their offence, and seek my face: [y] in their affliction they will seek me early.

V. 5. The idolatrous Israelites proudly refused to submit to God, to return to his worship, or to seek forgiveness: they insolently justified themselves, and as it were set him at defiance, by their impenitent rebellion and self-confidence; and this arrogance, which was visible even in their looks, would prove the immediate cause of their ruin: and as Judah also was treading in their steps they would at length fall with them, under the same condemnation. (Note, iv. 15.)

V. 6. 'This verse is meant of Judah, though they 'did frequent the temple-worship: yet they came thither 'without any true sense of religion. God is said to hide 'or withdraw himself when he will not answer men's 'prayers, nor afford them reasonable help in time of need.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. The people married idolaters, and brought up their children as heathens, estranged from God and his worship: this ripened them for destruction; so that a month, or a short and limited time, would destroy both them, and the idols which they had chosen for their portion.

V. 8—10. The prophet called upon the watchmen of Israel and Judah to blow the trumpet of alarm; for the enemy was just at hand: and when the Assyrians had desolated the cities of Israel, even to Bethaven, the principal seat of idolatry, they would fall upon Benjamin also, which belonged to the kingdom of Judah. Ephraim would be totally desolated by the enemy, in the approaching day of rebuke: for the prophet had declared among the tribes of Israel, that only which would surely come to pass. The princes of Judah, by violating God's law, had broken down the fence of his protection; and made way for his wrath to be poured out upon them, as an inundation of waters. When Ahaz, king of Judah, with his princes, called on the kings of Assyria to help him against Syria and Israel, he removed the bound, and opened the way for that inundation, which desolated Israel, and reduced Judah to deep distress. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11, 12. The Israelites suffered exceedingly from the exactions and oppressions of their rulers, and of victorious invaders. This was permitted in order to punish them for their willing and persevering obedience to the laws of Jeroboam and his successors, which required them to worship the golden calves at Dan and Bethel, and to conform to other established idolatries, in express contradiction to the law of God. He would therefore, insensibly, yet assuredly, waste their strength and prosperity, as a moth eats holes in the garment: and as Judah had proved equally submissive to the will of their idolatrous kings; he would consume them, as rottenness and worms do the wood.

V. 13. 14. When Israel and Judah, at different times, found themselves pressed by enemies and dangers; instead of humbling themselves before God and seeking his help, they sought the protection of the Assyrians, and sent to king Jareb, (perhaps another name for Pul, or Tiglath-pilezer:) but instead of healing their wounds, or doing them any service, they helped to make them incurable. (Marg. Ref.) This obstinacy provoked the Lord to become their open enemy, and to destroy them, as a fierce young lion would tear and carry away the helpless cattle; whilst none of their idols or allies could rescue them from his hands. Jareb signifies He shall plead. The king of Assyria perhaps undertook to be arbitrator between Judah and Israel, and to mediate a peace.

V. 15. The mercy-seat was properly the Lord's place among his people; which he left when he came forth to execute vengeance upon them: but having done this, he meant to return to his place, and there to wait and to leave them under their punishment, till they should repent, or plead guilty, and confess their sins, and seek his favour and protection. And he knew that, however they had despised him, in their affliction they would feel their need of him, and seek him without delay or remissness.—(Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All ranks of men must stand before God in judgment; and all ought to yield an obedient ear to his word, and to the warnings of his ministers to "flee from the wrath to "come:" for as all have sinned, all should repent, and humbly seek his pardoning mercy. None are exposed to severer punishment, than they who artfully entice men to sin and ensnare them in fatal errors; and kings and priests have often been peculiarly guilty of this great transgression. They who apostatise from God and his truth, commonly become the bitterest enemies to such as adhere to him: they have often employed most profound dissimulation and diabolical malice, to make slaughter of them, as enemies to the Church and state; and rubukes and corrections have seldom deterred them from persecuting projects. The Lord perfectly knows men, and none of their designs or motives are concealed from him; though they deeply disguise them from others, and even from themselves, and cover their grossest defilements with specious pretensions. Our doings must be carefully framed to return to the Lord, if we would be at peace with him: for he delighteth not in a vain profession, and empty forms or notions; but he requires that our repentance and faith be manifested in our whole temper and conduct. But they who know not the Lord, nor "the "power of his anger," the value of his favour, and the efficacy of his converting grace; remain under the influence of that "spirit which worketh in the children of disobe-"dience; and will never frame their doings to return to "God." Pride makes men obstinate in other sins, and rivets the chains which sensual or worldly lusts have forged: for "the wicked through the pride of their coun-"tenance will not seek after God," or submit to him in sincere repentance; and therefore, having fallen into, they must perish in, iniquity. With such unhumbled, unbelieving, and rebellious hearts, men may go with their flocks and herds, and the most expensive and ostentatious services, to seek the Lord: but they will not find him; for he withdraws himself from proud pharisees and hypocrites to commune with broken-hearted publicans and sinners.—By dealing treacherously with the Lord men only deceive themselves. The educating of children, as strangers to God and his truth, exceedingly hastens the doom of guilty nations: when tokens of approaching ruin appear, ministers ought to give the alarm before evil overtake the criminals; and when some are cut off in the day of the Lord's rebuke, they must warn others to expect the same punishment unless they repent. Such things will be generally among the tribes of Israel; and the watchman must give warning, if he mean to deliver his own soul. When princes break down the fence of the divine law, by their edicts, decisions, or examples, they open the flood-gates of God's wrath: and when subjects willingly obey ungodly and persecuting statutes, they may expect to be given up to grievous oppressions and exactions; for God will disregard the interest, liberty, and security of those who disregard his honour and renounce his service. His more ordinary judgments insensibly waste men's prosperity and comfort; but when under rebukes they trust to an arm of flesh, and have recourse to sinful expedients, they will not only find that they cannot bring cure or deliverance, but that God will visit them with more terrible displays of his indignation. Yet he will return to his place, his mercy-seat, and wait there to be gracious to all who acknowledge their offences and seek his face. Many, indeed, who despise him in their prosperity, appear to seek him under their afflictions: but he knows how to distinguish the upright from the hypocrite; and they who are first led by severe tribulations to seek him earnestly, diligently, and sincerely, will find him a present Help and an effectual Refuge; as with him is mercy and plenteous redemption, for all those who call upon him in truth.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—3. The prophet took occasion from the intimation of mercy at the close of the former chapter, to exhort the people, without delay to come together, and with one accord to return to the worship of the Lord. As this referred to the events predicted in the former chapter; that is, to the desolations that were coming on the people, by the Assyrians and Chaldeans; the exhortation may be considered as the language of the penitents to each other and to their neighbours, calling on them to unite in humiliation, repentance, and works meet for repentance. They considered their miseries as the effect of God's righteous indignation. He had torn and smitten them, and their enemies were his instruments; and from his mercy, truth, and power alone, they hoped for deliverance; he alone could, and they trusted he would, heal their distempers and bind up their wounds. Instead therefore of fleeing from him as an enemy, they encouraged each other to apply to him as their Physician. For some time they would have to wait for his interposition; the nation of Israel was as it were dead, but after two days, that is, on the third day, the Lord would revive them, and they would live in his sight, as his people, upon their return from the Babylonish captivity, after the appointed time of its continuance. The language is generally supposed to be prophetic of the resurrection of Christ on the third day, with whom as her Surety the whole Church virtually arose from the dead, to live unto God; with him the hopes of all believers revived; his power, as risen, quickens their souls when dead in sin; and his resurrection was the earnest of the resurrection of their bodies unto everlasting life. In the persevering exercise of faith, and by waiting on the Lord, in every means of becoming acquainted with him and his perfections, truth, and will, they would obtain an experimental knowledge of his mercy and faithfulness, and a comforting knowledge of their own pardon and acceptance. For "his going forth was prepared "as the morning:" the time that intervened between the promise of a Saviour to fallen man, unto his coming, and exaltation at the right hand of the Father, resembled that which intervenes between the dawning of the day, and the meridian brightness of the sun; and he would as surely come and effect the redemption of his Church, as sun-rising follows the dawn. His coming likewise to save and comfort every penitent, would be gradual and certain, from his first sense of his guilt to the completion of his salvation in heavenly felicity. (Note, Prov. iv. 18, 19.) In neither sense, doth his going forth resemble a meteor, or the evening sun; but the increasing brightness of the morning from the first dawn, which can scarcely be discerned, or distinguished from other appearances, to the noon-day brightness. The Lord would also descend upon the souls of those who waited on him, as the former and latter rain upon the earth; purifying, softening, fructifying, and refreshing them, by the influences of his Holy Spirit.

V. 4, 5. Neither Ephraim nor Judah would thus wait for and on the Lord; and he spake as one that was at a loss what to do with them. He was not willing wholly to give them up; yet he did not deem it honourable to save them from ruin in their present state of mind, and all means used to reform them had proved ineffectual. Whilst they were smarting under the rod or filled with terror; or when their reforming kings were exerting their pious endeavours, or the prophets were labouring among them; they seemed favourably disposed to repent and return to the Lord: but this their goodness, (unlike the morning light, or the stated rain,) vanished like the empty morning-cloud and the early dew, and produced no abiding effect on their conduct: and when the causes of these transient impressions ceased, they relapsed into idolatry and iniquity, and were as vile as ever. In the night of adversity, they seemed religious; but the rising sun of returning prosperity dispersed all these promising appearances. Therefore it was, that the Lord sent them such awful messages by the prophets, as were suited either to hew them into shape or to hew them in pieces; nay, "he slew them by the "words of his mouth," which were like pronouncing the sentence of death on a criminal, and giving orders for his execution; and the judgments, that were denounced against them were gradually and certainly approaching, as the light from the dawning of the day, instead of that favour which was arising upon true penitents: nay, the justice of God would be as clear as the morning light.

V. 6. All the appointed sacrifices were typical of Christ's atonement, external signs of the offerer's faith and repentance, acts of worship towards God, and means of grace to believers. But the people deemed them the substantial part of religion; presented them in unbelief, pride, and impenitence; and thought to compensate by them for their entire neglect of justice, mercy, and piety, and for all their scandalous crimes: and when they omitted these institutions, they thought the Lord's controversy with them was chiefly on that account. He therefore informed them, that he "desired mercy and not sacrifice," or rather than sacrifice; and the knowledge of him, which produced holy fear, dependence, submission, obedience, and love, more than burnt-offerings; because they were of superior excellency and immutable obligation. He was displeased with them for their injustice, oppression of the poor, idolatry, and impiety: and no number of sacrifices could avail them, whilst they continued in sin. This no way interferes with the great doctrine, of the sacrifice of Christ being the sole meritorious cause of a sinner's pardon and acceptance with God; or with that of faith alone interesting us in his atonement: or with the necessity of our attendance on instituted ordinances. But it exposes the folly of such as trust in external observances of any kind, to compensate for their want of love to God and man: it shows, that nothing can profit which does not spring from repentance and faith, and is not attended with a sober, righteous, and godly life; and that externals may safely be omitted or postponed, when the exercise of mercy and kindness to our brethren requires it. V. 8, 9. Ramoth-gilead, beyond Jordan, was one of the cities of refuge, and allotted to the priests; but it was totally given up to wickedness and polluted with murder. (Marg. Ref.) The company of priests also, that dwelt there, was a mere banditti; consenting together in robbery, murder, and every enormity; standing by each other in doing, and vindicating their evil deeds. (Marg.)—'The Hebrew word Aven, translated iniquity, frequently 'signifies idolatry; and the blood which Gilead is said to 'have been polluted with, may mean the blood of their 'children which they sacrificed to Moloch. Dr. Wells 'interprets it, of those Gileadites who assisted Pekah in 'the murder of Pekahiah, (2 Kings xv. 25.) The phrase 'translated here, "polluted with blood," literally signi-'fies with bloody footsteps, being taken from such as are 'found with their shoes stained with the blood they have 'shed.' (1 Kings ii. 5.) (Lowth.) The word rendered "by consent," seems to mean towards Shechem. The priests beset the road to Shechem, as robbers and murderers.

V. 10. An horrible thing. 'Such an apostacy from 'God, as cannot be mentioned without horror.' (Lowth.) —The idolatry begun by Jeroboam, of the tribe of Ephraim, had opened the way for all the subsequent abominations, by which the kingdom of Israel was polluted. "He made Israel to sin."

V. 11. The seeds of idolatry, from Israel, had been sown plenteously in Judah; and thus he, (that is Israel, or Ephraim,) had prepared a harvest for Judah also. The nation was become ripe for divine judgments, which would be inflicted by the Assyrians and Chaldeans; until the time when God would "turn away the captivity of his people." (Ps. xiv. 7. liii. 6. cxxvi. 1.) "When I would have "turned away the captivity of my people;" 'When I 'would, upon their repentance, have averted my judg-'ments, which will end in their captivity.' (Lowth.)—"Among those who lead away the captivity of my peo-"ple." (Bp. Newcombe.) This translation requires only a trivial change of the pointing.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In all our troubles we should place our whole confidence in the Lord's mercy; and should take warning and encouragement to return to him, and exhort others to do the same. He afflicts us in providence, that we may look to him to restore our prosperity: he convinces and humbles our hearts by his Holy Spirit, and often fills the conscience with remorse and dismay, in order to prepare us for the healing balm of his salvation, and the consolations which he bestows on the contrite believer. No affliction or temptation therefore, no guilt or power of sin, no wounded spirit or terrified conscience, should induce us to despair of help and comfort from God. He may suffer us for a time to be seized on with "the sorrows of death or the "pains of hell," and to be "like those that go down into "the pit:" but as he raised the Redeemer from the grave; so will he revive the hearts and hopes of all that trust in him, and cause them at length to walk before him, and to rejoice in his manifested presence and love. Let us then begin and "follow on to know the LORD;" that we may experience the freeness and efficacy of his grace, the faithfulness of his promises, and the felicity of his people. The feeblest glimpse of hope in his word, which dawns upon the humbled sin-distressed soul, is a sure earnest of increasing light and comfort, till "the Sun of righteousness shall "arise upon him with healing in his wings;" and till he shall arrive in the presence above, and possess the fulness of knowledge, purity, love, and joy for evermore. Increasing light and hope shall be afforded to the waiting soul, with showers of purifying, fertilizing, and comforting grace; and he, who sent the former, will send the latter rain also, and perfect the good work that he hath begun. But we have not the same reason to depend on our own resolutions, convictions, or hopeful beginnings, as we have to trust in the truth and mercy of our God: alas! these are as mutable, as the others are unchangeable. Under the rod of affliction, under terrors of conscience, or under the awakening word of some Boanerges, many seem deeply impressed and well disposed to religion: but when the restraint, the scourge, the terror is removed, their transient goodness vanishes like an empty cloud, or is exhaled by temptation as the dew by the burning sun; and we mourn our disappointed expectations respecting them. What shall be done with such persons? For "if "any man draw back, the Lord will have no pleasure in "him." Or what shall he do to us, who are prone to a similar, if not an equal, inconstancy? May he put his fear into our hearts, and set up his kingdom within us, and never, never more, leave us to ourselves, or suffer us to be overcome by temptation! Obstinate transgressors must not expect soothing messages from a holy God: he will "hew them by the words of his prophets:" and if this do not prevail to bring down to the dust of self-abasement, "he will slay them by the words of his "mouth" and, by executing his threatened vengeance on them, convince them of the truth of his holy word. All oblations and external services are mere pride and hypocrisy, whilst justice, mercy, truth, and piety are neglected: and that confidence even in the sacrifice of Christ is mere presumption, which encourages any one to continue in sin. If men had the true knowledge of God, they could not be so deluded; and if they were partakers of true faith, they could not but hate sin, and uprightly fear, love, obey, and serve the Lord. But under every dispensation men prove themselves the children of Adam, by breaking the law, and abusing the mercy and goodness of God: the most favoured places become most notorious for sin; the most sacred offices are often filled by the vilest of men; no tongue can express what horrible defilements God sees continually even in his visible Church. But whilst multitudes are ripening for destruction, a time is coming, when he will return the captivity of his people, and fill the earth with his glory: and then Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall abound in songs of grateful praise.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—3. The labours of Elijah, Elisha, and many other prophets; the ruin of Ahab's idolatrous family by Jehu, who destroyed Baal out of Israel; and all that succession of mercies and warnings, which the Lord continued to them, were means used for their healing: but they eventually served the more to discover the extreme wickedness of all ranks of men; especially in Samaria, where fraud, violence, and robbery were perpetrated in the most atrocious manner. For they never seriously considered that God noted and remembered against them, all their wickedness; not even when the effects of their crimes beset them about, and caused them manifold distresses. But as their kings and princes were given up to idolatry and other wickedness, the people were glad to oblige them, by conforming to their false worship, copying their vices, and lavishing flattering encomiums, upon them; with which they were highly gratified, and rendered bolder in wickedness. The succession of kings from Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, to the prophet's time, may be intended.

V. 4. The whole company were adulterers as well as idolaters, and were most eagerly bent upon the indulgence of their unlawful lusts. Their hearts were inflamed with sensual desires like a heated oven. Satan or his agents had kindled this fire: and they cherished and kept it burning; waiting for the opportunity of gratifying it without regard to duty or decency. The tempter had only to prepare them the occasion of sin, as the baker prepares the dough for the heated oven; and they were ready to seize upon it. (Marg.) "He will cease from waking, after, "&c." (Marg.) The baker may take his rest, till the dough be ready. (6, 7.)

V. 5—7. On the king's birth-day, or coronation-day, or some other public occasion when he made a royal feast, his nobles tempted him to drink to the most shameful excess, "making him sick with bottles of wine;" (or the heat of wine:) and when he was thus intoxicated, "he "stretched out his hand with scorners;" treated every thing sacred with the most impious contempt, and perhaps employed his authority to persecute the worshippers of JEHOVAH. 'Some recent and notorious act of contempt 'to God, or to his prophets, or to public justice, is here 'alluded to.' (Bp. Newcomb.) Thus they prepared themselves and each other for every daring wickedness; and perhaps some of them had their hearts inflamed with ambition and revenge, and lay in wait for that opportunity to murder the drunken king and usurp his throne. Their furious passions rendered Satan's temptations unnecessary. Their baker might sleep all the night, and in the morning find his oven as hot as he could wish it, that is their hearts as ready for any wickedness as could be desired. For, being heated with wine and sinful passions, they murdered their magistrates and kings one after another: yet neither the people nor any one of their kings, amid these distractions and miseries, would seek help from God! (Notes, 2 Kings xv. xvi.)

V. 8—10. Ephraim, (or the kingdom of the ten tribes,) had intimately connected himself with the surrounding nations, by alliances, intermarriages, and communion in idolatry: yet he still pretended to worship JEHOVAH. Thus he became a cake not turned, half burnt and half dough, and none of it fit for use: a motly mixture of idolatry and the worship of God. But he was eager in iniquity, and lukewarm in religion, and partial in every attempt to reform. The strange gods and heathen alliances weakened him continually; and the neighbouring nations by hostile invasions devoured his strength: yet he perceived no danger, and never suspected the cause of his decay, namely, that the hand of God was lifted up against him. (Marg. Ref.) In short, he had as evident tokens of approaching ruin, as gray hairs are of old age and of the decay of the constitution: and the prophets evidently saw these symptoms, and pointed them out to him, but he took no notice. This arose from his pride, which openly testified against him; seeing neither judgments, warnings, nor mercies could induce him to return and seek the Lord.

V. 11, 12. In another view of the subject, the conduct of Ephraim might be likened to that of a dove; Ephraim was become like a silly dove; not in innocence and gentleness, but in folly and timorousness, having neither understanding, courage, nor resolution. He was frighted at every appearance of danger: but instead of fleeing to the Lord for refuge, as the doves fly to their windows; he was like the silly dove, that flieth here and there for safety till she is taken in the fowler's net. Sometimes he applied to the Assyrians, and sometimes to the Egyptians, without prudence, or prospect of safety: and thus he would be entangled in the net which the Lord had spread for him; and be overtaken with inevitable ruin, as the fowls are ensnared and destroyed by the fowler. For God would certainly punish them, as the congregation of Israel had repeatedly heard from the prophets; and especially, as had been foretold in the books of Moses. (Marg. Ref.) "When they hearken to their assembly." 'When they are swayed by the counsel of their assembly to seek foreign assistance.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 13—16. Deserved ruin must come upon the people, seeing they had not only transgressed against God, but fled from him, who alone could pardon and save them. Though he had often redeemed them from their enemies; yet they had spoken lies against him, as if he were a severe master, and his service hard and unprofitable; or they had mocked him with hypocritical professions of repentance. Even when, on the bed of sickness or death, or labouring under heavy afflictions, they howled out for anguish and terror, and vented their bitter and impatient complaints before God; they did not cry to him with their hearts; they did not humble themselves before him or expect help from him; at least they did not intend to return to his service, but only cried out, (like the unclean spirit,) "Torment me "not," in a mixture of horror and enmity. When they met together to pray for a favourable harvest or vintage, they only sought these things to consume on their lusts, and persisted at the very time in rebellion against God, (James iv. 1—3.) And when the Lord chastised them, and afterwards bound up their wounds and strengthened them, they still devised more rebellion and wickedness against him. Even when they seemed to repent and turn to him, they only left Baal to worship the golden calves; or they rested in some form of external reformation, and never came up to true repentance, faith, spiritual worship, or holy obedience. They deceived every expectation formed of them, like a broken or an useless bow in the day of battle: their princes therefore would one after another perish by the sword, for their daring impieties and revilings of God's prophets: and their miseries would excite the derision of the Egyptians, on whom they had depended for protection against the Assyrians. (Marg. Ref.) providential dispensations, only serve to detect and aggravate their wickedness; except they be accompanied with his special blessing. The whole salvation of the righteous is therefore of the Lord: but the condemnation of the wicked is of themselves, and justly deserved. Men commit numerous and heinous crimes, without reflection, recollection, or remorse: because they consider not that the Lord remembers all their wickedness, and will produce the whole of it as evidence against them, and show all the world the justice of their punishment by discovering the malignity of their crimes. Alas, how poor an object do men attain, who ingratiate themselves with ungodly kings and nobles, by wickedness and lies; and thus expose themselves to the wrath of God, and even increase the condemnation of their wicked patrons! The depraved hearts of men and the temptations of Satan are as congenial as fire and fuel, and concur in preparing sinners for the practice of every crime: and want of opportunity, ability, or courage prevents more wickedness, than perhaps all other causes combined. So that the open, and even the secret, enormities of men's lives, atrocious as they are, bear a very small proportion to the desperate wickedness of their hearts. But when lust is inwardly conceived and cherished, it will more or less break forth into outward sin: he, who first suggests the idea of forbidden indulgence, will assist in devising the means of gratification; and then sinners will proceed without further temptation, "having made ready their hearts like an oven," whilst they lie in wait for the opportunity. Thus adulteries, murders, and all horrible crimes are perpetrated, without hesitation or remorse, when they can be done with present impunity. Days of public festivity are commonly attended with much wickedness, and followed with many fatal effects. Intoxication leads men to every kind of impiety and immorality: but what an infamy is it for a king to be made sick with bottles of wine, and to be a companion and an example to scorners and blasphemers! They who tempt rulers to such a degrading vice, can never be their friends: and not unfrequently the event shows that they were plotting their ruin; and that they were lying in wait, with hearts full of malice or ambition, to murder both body and soul, by an exquisite refinement in cruelty. Whilst men thus execute the vengeance of God an each other, how seldom do those that witness such transactions, call upon God, who alone can preserve them from being involved in similar ruin! Thus nations ripen for destruction: and such as are called Christians, often differ in nothing from pagans, except in the worthless attempt to form a coalition between religion and the world; that is between God and the devil! But we are so blind to ourselves, that neither nations, churches, nor individuals can see, in their own case, those symptoms of decay and approaching ruin, which are visible to all around them! The same pride, that emboldens men to break the law of God, leads them to self-flattery, and to continue impenitent amidst the rebukes of providence, and the warnings of his word. "They will not return to the LORD, nor seek him "for all this."

V. 11—16.

When sinners are terrified, and driven from one scheme to another for safety; they are so devoid of understanding, that the mercy and grace of God are frequently the only refuge to which they never think of fleeing! But whatever other expedients they have recourse to, the Lord will take them in his net, and execute upon them those judgments, of which all his congregations have heard. Wo then be to those transgressors, who attempt to flee from God! for in this way destruction is inevitable. But to him, as the Redeemer of Israel, the chief of sinners may approach with acceptance; and they who perish in their sins, speak lies against him, if they charge their ruin either on his secret purposes, or his refusal to have mercy on them. Yet numbers, when in deep distress they howl forth their terrors in the form of prayers, do not cry to God with their hearts, for the blessings of his complete salvation. Even their prayers for temporal mercies only require provision for their lusts, and are united with rebellion. Whether God afflict and weaken, or bind up and strengthen them, they continue to devise mischief against him. Their very repentance, and conversion from one sect, sentiment, form, or vice to another, leave them far short of conversion to Christ and holiness: for "they return, but not to the most High," and rest in some plausible scheme of hypocrisy or false religion. When they speak fair, their professions are deceitful; but when they vent outrageous blasphemies and lies, their tongues agree with their hearts; and their destruction will be attended with the derision and contempt of their tempters and companions in iniquity. Such is human nature! Such is the progress and end of impiety! Such shall we prove if left to ourselves! "Create in us a clean heart, O God, and renew a right "spirit within us."

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1. The prophet, as Israel's watchman, was commanded to blow the trumpet, and give warning of the coming of the Assyrian king with speed and violence, like an eagle, against the people among whom God had dwelt; because they had now provoked him by violating his covenant to depart from them. [e] be meant God's people in general, whom he formerly [f] took care of, as his own family, (ix. 15.) This may [g] probably denote Sennacherib's invasion.' (Lowth.)—This verse may be considered as a general warning to Judah as well as Israel: though the following verses are immediately addressed to the ten tribes.

V. 2—4. When Israel should be hard pressed by the Assyrians, they would claim a relation to God, and profess to put themselves under his protection, as a people that had known and worshipped him. But their pretensions would be disregarded; for they had cast off him that is good, or "that which is good;" they had forsaken the LORD, and his temple and worship: they had despised his prophets and trampled on his law, by their idolatries and iniquities, and this for many ages: therefore their enemies would pursue and prevail against them. They had set up kings and princes of their own choosing, in opposition to his chosen race the family of David, when they revolted from Rehoboam, and through all succeeding generations: they never consulted their heavenly King, about the appointment of their earthly kings: and both they and their kings and princes, had employed their treasures in making idols, as if on purpose to provoke God to cut them off.

V. 5, 6. The calf of Samaria, (or that placed at Bethel, in the kingdom of which Samaria was the capital,) could not protect its worshippers: but would cast them off, when they were left in the hands of the Assyrians, who seized upon their idol also. "Remove far from thee thy "calf, O Samaria." (Bp. Newcombe.) And how long would it be ere they cleared themselves of this idolatry: Did they never intend it? The whole of that worship was Israel's invention, from the time when the golden calf was made in the wilderness, contrary to the express command of God. The workmen made the idol, and it could neither be God, nor any proper representation of him; but a mere dead image of a calf, that would soon be broken to pieces.

V. 7, 8. All the expense and trouble of the people in their worship, and all their crimes, politics, and heathen alliances, by which they attempted to secure themselves, were only sowing the wind; and if they had any increase, they could only reap the whirlwind. Such seed could produce nothing valuable: and if a little transient prosperity seemed to result from it, it would soon be torn from them by strangers, who would swallow them up with their property; and they would be left among the nations, as a broken or mean vessel, which a man throws away, or uses for the basest purposes.

V. 9, 10. When the Syrians attacked the Israelites, they applied for help to the kings of Assyria; and they ran about as a headstrong wild ass when separated from his companions. At a vast expense they hired the assistance of idolaters, and conformed to their mode of worship. But though they seemed to have obtained their purpose, and to have engaged powerful allies; yet the Lord would gather them together against them as their enemies; and would begin to punish them by the burden or tribute laid on them by the king of Assyria, who called himself a king of princes. Yet this would be a light affliction, compared with those that would follow. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11, 12. The Israelites, having, in the days of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, forsaken the temple and altar at Jerusalem, erected altars at Bethel and Dan, and at several other places, both to the golden calves and to Baal, &c.; as if they had purposely intended to add sin to sin: therefore their altars and sacrifices would be imputed to them as aggravated crimes, and expose them to just and dreadful punishment. The Lord had caused the great and important truths and requirements of his law, respecting himself and the worship and service which he required, to be written for their instruction, and he had sent his prophets to enforce it upon the people; but they continued to treat it as a strange thing; they knew scarcely any thing of it, they disregarded and despised it, and adhered to their own devices. 'Thus 13 * They sacrifice flesh for the sacrifices of mine offerings, and eat it; [m] but the LORD accepteth them not: [n] now will he remember their iniquity, and visit their sins: [o] they shall return to Egypt.

14 For Israel hath [p] forgotten his [q] Maker, [r] and buildeth temples; [s] and Judah hath multiplied fenced cities: but [t] I will send a fire upon his cities, and it shall devour the palaces thereof.

'the idolaters count the word of God as strange, in 'respect of their own inventions." Alas, in how many places, even among protestants, is a minister, who inculcates the great doctrines of Christianity, as stated at the reformation, accused of preaching a new religion, and "bring-"ing strange things to the ears" of the people!

V. 13. The people professed to sacrifice unto God while they "made void his commandments, that they might "keep their own traditions:" but the feast which they made on the sacrifice, was their sole advantage: for the Lord, instead of accepting their worship, was determined to punish their obstinate disobedience and idolatry; and to reduce them to as grievous a bondage as their fathers had endured in Egypt. 'Going into Egypt was a proverbial 'speech for extreme misery.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref)

V. 14. When the Israelites were wholly forgetful of God, and regardless of his authority, they erected temples to the golden calves and to other idols. Judah also, instead of confiding in the Lord, multiplied fenced cities, as their security against invaders; thus both Israel and Judah were provoking God to pour out his judgments upon them, which would soon destroy their cities, temples, and palaces, as by one general conflagration.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Great earnestness and boldness are especially required, when ministers are called to warn degenerate professors of religion of approaching ruin, and exhort them to repent of transgressing God's law, and despising his covenant. In times of great danger, and especially in the day of judgment, many will say, "My God we know "thee," and "Lord, Lord, open to us;" to whom he will answer, "Depart from me, ye workers of iniquity." For evil will overtake all that cast off that which is good, and rest in a mere form of godliness. No comfort can be expected in any of the relations of life, which we form without consulting God: good rulers, masters, or servants, as well as more intimate relatives, should be sought from him and valued as his gift. Nor can we expect success in any undertaking, even in our temporal concerns, in which we do not acknowledge him, and seek to know and do his will. They who covetously idolize gold and silver, are nearly as criminal as they were who formerly made images of them to worship: and in various ways men act, as if they were bent upon their own ruin. All our carnal confidences will one day fail us; because we provoke God to jealousy by putting them in his place. But how long will it be, ere we any of us "attain unto innocency," and renounce all our idols? No human inventions can form an essential part of our religious worship, any more than the work of the carpenter or goldsmith can be a god. Let us then not be deceived: what a man sows that also shall he reap: and they who sow vanity shall reap destruction and confusion. No good can come from impiety, idolatry, and wickedness, whatever pains or expense men bestow upon them: and the transient prosperity of fools will not only soon terminate, but it will destroy them. Apostates will be confounded in punishment with other evil doers; except as they will be more disgraced than they, and become among ungodly men, as a vessel in which the Lord hath no pleasure. Men are often more brutish than the most stupid of the animals, and more obstinate than the most untractable: they are so enslaved to their vile affections, that they pay very dear for the gratification of them even in this world; but this is only a little sorrow, compared with the punishment prepared for them hereafter.—So long as men despise the truths and precepts of God's written word, and count the mysteries of his nature, the demands of his law, the doctrines of his Gospel, and the ordinances of his worship, a strange thing; all the observances and costly oblations of their own devising, will be unto them for sin: for the Lord accepteth nothing which is not done in faith; and he will remember and punish the sins of all men, except those of the true believer. And whether they who forget God, multiply temples or palaces, or castles; they can by no means secure themselves against the wrath of that "righteous Judge," whose justice they have provoked, and whose salvation they have neglected, despised, or abused.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1—3. "Thou shalt not rejoice for 'joy," &c. Perhaps the Israelites were joyfully celebrating some public success, or gathering in their vintage or harvest, when the prophet published this message to them. They had no right to rejoice, as Judah had, where were still considerable remains of true religion; or even as other nations, which had not forsaken God, in so aggravated a manner, or been guilty of such deep contempt or so base and ungrateful an apostacy, as they had. Their prosperity therefore would be more transient and ruinous, than that of other nations; for like an adulterous woman, they had violated their covenant with God, and preferred the most worthless idols to him. They loved even to receive the fruits of the earth, as from these their paramours; as festivals in honour of their idols were more suited to their state of heart, than presenting the sacrifices of thanksgiving to God, and honouring him with their substance, (ii. 12.) He therefore would visit them with famine; so that their corn-floor and wine-press would not suffice for their support, instead of supplying their luxurious revels; and the "new wine would lie to "her," by disappointing her expectations, that is, those of the nation, considered as a harlot. Nay, the people would not be allowed to inhabit the Lord's favoured and good land, where he deigned to dwell among his worshippers: some of them would migrate into Egypt, either in the time of famine or when pressed by the Assyrians: the rest would be carried into Assyria, and there be constrained to live on food that was ceremoniously unclean, or even refuse and vile, being pressed with extreme necessity.

4 They [l] shall not offer wine-offerings to the LORD, [m] neither shall they be pleasing unto him: their sacrifices shall be unto them [n] as the bread of mourners: all that eat thereof shall be polluted: for [o] their bread for their soul shall not come into the house of the LORD.

V. 4—6. The Israelites would have no opportunity of pouring out wine-offerings to the Lord, nor any wine to do it with; neither could they present any acceptable service, or have any communion with him, (as the word may signify.) Their sacrifices would be either totally interrupted, or would be as the bread of mourners; who being unclean could not eat of the holy things without violating the law. (Marg. Ref.) The shew-bread would no longer be presented in the house of the Lord in their behalf; nor sacrifices offered for them. And what would they do, on their solemn feasts, when both the spiritual and carnal joy of them had ceased? For the prophet, as it were, beheld, and saw the people gone out of the land, to avoid impending destruction: and they would be collected together into Egypt, to die and be buried there: whilst their pleasant places, which were decorated or filled with silver, (as well as their other more humble tabernacles,) would soon be overgrown with nettles and thorns.

V. 7, 8. The prophets had long foretold these days of visitation and retribution, and Israel would soon know the truth of their predictions; though they now counted the prophet a fool, and the inspired servant of God a madman, because of their extreme depravity, and enmity to the Lord and his cause. Or the event would show their false prophets and pretenders to inspiration to have been fools and madmen, to whose delusions God had given up Israel, to punish the multitude of their crimes and their great hatred of him. The prophet observed that the watchmen of Ephraim, (as Elijah, Elisha, Micaiah, &c.) had communed with his God, had him with them in their work, and wrought with him in turning many to righteousness: but these nominal watchmen, or prophets, were in all their ways like the snare of a fowler, to entangle men to their ruin; as they increased the people's hatred of God and his worship, and thus brought down vengeance upon themselves and them, by their idolatry or hypocrisy. The marginal reading, "hatred against the house of his God," gives the clearer sense. Some give another turn to the verse, 'Ye falsely imagined that these prophets of Ephraim 'were sent of God, and had familiar acquaintance with him: 'but ye shall find them to be but as the snare of a fowler.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 9, 10. (Notes, Judg. xix—xxi.) The people of all the tribes of Israel were become as deeply corrupted as the men of Gibeah, who abused and murdered the Levite's concubine; or those of the tribe of Benjamin, who defended the perpetrators of that detestable crime, and so were almost wholly cut off: and in like manner God would remember and visit the crimes of the generation, to whom the prophet spake. Indeed Israel in his first and best days, just before his entrance into Canaan, was as pleasing to God, as grapes would be to a weary traveller in the parched desert; or as the first ripe figs, when being scarce they are the more valued; yet even when the nation thus followed the Lord in the wilderness, a multitude of them were seduced by the Midianitish women, to frequent the temple of Baal-peor, and to separate themselves from God's ordinances unto that shameful idolatry, and that abominable whoredom, which they loved better than the spiritual and holy worship of JEHOVAH. The Hebrew word yenazzaru, were separated, 'alludes to the order of 'the Nazarites, who were in a peculiar manner set apart 'for God's service. Whereas these dedicated themselves 'to the service of that filthy idol Baal-peor,—Besheth, 'shame, was a nickname for Baal, so Jerub-baal is called 'Jerub-besheth.' (2 Sam. xi. 21.) (Note, Judg. vi. 31, 32.)

V. 11—14. Ephraim signifies fruitfulness: and the vast number to which this tribe had increased, was its peculiar glory. (Marg. Ref.) By this distinction, the Ephraimites seem to have been greatly elated, but it was about to fly away, speedily and irrecoverably, as a bird let loose. Their children would die as soon as they were born, or be still-born or abortions; by which the nation would be gradually enfeebled and diminished: and of the small number, that should grow up to maturity, the Lord would so bereave them by various judgments, that there should be scarcely any left of them: for nothing but misery could ensue, when God had been provoked to depart from them in anger, and to deprive them of his gracious presence and protection. Indeed Ephraim had been as prosperous and replenished, and as pleasantly situated, as even the flourishing city of Tyre, which excited the admiration of all beholders: but from this time they would bring forth and educate children, merely to be butchered by their enemies. So that the prophet scarcely knew what to ask in their behalf; or could only entreat the Lord to give them "a miscarrying womb and dry breasts," as a less calamity than bringing forth children for the murderer, or to be trained up in idolatry. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15—17. Gilgal, where their fathers first covenanted with God, after they had entered the promised land, and where his tabernacle once stood before it was removed to Shiloh (Josh. v. 9, 10. x. 41.) was at the time when the prophet wrote, become the repository or all kinds of idolatry and iniquity, whence they were diffused through the land on each side of Jordan: therefore the Lord abhorred them, and resolved to drive them out of his house, as an adulteress woman when divorced. (Note, iv. 15.) Nor would he any more love them, or specially favour them; seeing all their princes were revolters, rebels, and apostates. Indeed the calamities were begun: their root was dried up, and their fruit would wither. When the Israelites were sentenced to fall in the wilderness, their children were preserved to inherit the promised land: but as Ephraim was to be finally rejected, even the beloved fruit of the womb would be slain with their parents, as those of the Canaanites had been. God had determined to cast them off, because they would not hearken to him: and the remnant of them would be scattered as wanderers among the nations. This was soon after fulfilled, respecting the kingdom of the ten tribes, and continues so to this day: and even such of them as were incorporated with the Jews, have with them been wanderers among the nations for many hundred years. (Notes, v. Marg. Ref.) It is wonderful, that these prophecies, so often repeated, and so exactly descriptive of the present state of that favoured nation, after many revolving ages, do not more impress the minds of those who read them, with admiration of the foreknowledge of God, and full conviction of the divine inspiration of the holy Scriptures.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—10.

They who abide under the wrath of God, and continue to accumulate guilt and condemnation, can have no good cause to rejoice in temporal prosperity: but such as apostatize from the religion of pious ancestors, violate their own solemn engagements, and run into wickedness in opposition to the convictions of their consciences, and the strivings of God's Spirit with them, have less reason for joy than any other sinners; for to them belongs the deepest condemnation. Abundance received as the reward of serving Mammon, or abused in making provision for men's lusts, will end either in most ruinous prosperity, or most distressing calamities. They whose pampered bodies are rendered unclean by their unlawful indulgences, may perhaps be reduced to the necessity of eating the most unclean and unwholesome food, through the extremity of indigence. But no famine is so dreadful as that of the soul: awful is the case of those who can perform no acceptable service to the Lord, but must either utterly neglect him, or render him such worship as he abhors: yet in this case we should all have been, had not the Son of God, by his incarnation, atonement, and intercession, opened us a door of access and acceptance through faith in his name. Men may now despise the solemn days and ordinances of God, and disrelish every feast that cannot gratify their sensuality. But the utter want of every means of grace and hope of mercy, will make them know their value; and what will they then do? Thus multitudes hurry on to destruction: their bodies are gathered into the grave; their souls sink into hopeless misery; and their pleasant places for their silver, as well as their commodious habitations, (if not covered with thorns and nettles,) yet pass into the hands of those who neither know nor care what is become of them. But the ministers of God, who foresee, and openly declare, these approaching days of visitation and recompense, must expect to be reviled as wild enthusiasts, or as weak and foolish men: for God leaves sinners under delusion, because of the greatness of their crimes and their enmity against him. But if carnal men deem the servants of God fools and madmen; these know, and can prove, them and their flattering teachers to be so. Happy are they that have watchmen placed over them, who walk with God, seek his glory, do his work, and enjoy his assistance and blessing: many such there have been, and are; may the Lord increase their numbers and prosper their labours! But more have been found crafty and selfish, ensnaring men in error and iniquity, and misleading them into the ways of ruin for their own mercenary ends; increasing men's hatred of God, and of each other, and thus disturbing and defiling even the house of the Lord. Alas! many parts of the Church are as corrupted as Benjamin was in the days of Gibeah, and may expect similar visitations At some times and in some places, a people are formed by divine grace, who are peculiarly delightful to our holy God; but then a falling off commonly succeeds, and some separate themselves to this shame, and others to that, according to the different abominations which they have loved. Thus they go out from true believers, because they were not of them; and their glory soon vanishes and appears no more.

V. 11—17.

How soon could our God insensibly waste the most populous nations! And what an alloy it is to our comfort in our beloved children, to reflect for what purposes they may be brought up and reserved! This is a sore vanity: but submission and confidence in God, and a conscientious performance of our duty, form the best remedy of it. Surely it is far more desirable to be written childless, than to bring up families in the service of sin and Satan! And they who provoke God to depart from them, can reasonably expect nothing but wo for themselves and their offspring, here and hereafter. The Lord will drive wicked and hypocritical professors with abhorrence out of his house, and love them no more: his wrath dries up the root and withers the fruit of all our comforts: and the poor scattered Jews, whom God hath cast off because they did not hearken to him, and whom he hath condemned to be wanderers among the nations, are a daily warning to us to beware, lest we neglect or abuse his Gospel: for how then could we escape a similar, or even a more terrible, condemnation?

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1—3. Israel had often been compared to a vine, which is valuable only for its fruit: but the nation was become an empty vine, that brought no fruit to perfection. They not only spent their abundance on themselves; but even their apparent good works sprang from ostentation or other selfish motives, and not from regard to the glory and will of God. As they were enriched by the produce of their good land, they multiplied altars and images; which had a goodly show of devotion, but were an abomination to the Lord. They vainly attempted to divide their hearts between him and idols, which were his rivals; and thus they were found guilty of violating the covenant of God, and of forfeiting all the blessings of their relation to him. By the Assyrians, he would certainly destroy their altars and images: and they should be left without any king to head or protect them, and be forced to confess, that because they had not feared the Lord, no king could do any thing effectual to preserve them from ruin. 'A king cannot protect us, if God be against 'us.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.) (Notes, 2 Kings xv.)

V. 4. The Israelites, in professing to covenant with God, or make vows to him, spake lies and joined perjury to hypocrisy. In swearing allegiance to their princes, they concealed the most treacherous intentions; and all their civil compacts and decisions, were conducted with fraud and perjury. Thus even the administration of justice, (as it should have been,) sprang up, like pestiferous hemlock in the furrows of the field; and tended to diffuse still wider deceit, injustice, impiety, and misery, throughout the whole land.

V. 5, 6. The inhabitants of Samaria would be seized with terror, when they heard that the golden calves, which had been worshipped at Bethel and Dan, were carried off by the invaders, or given as tribute to the Assyrian king. The people would regret the loss of their idols: but the priests, who had rejoiced in the emolument and credit which they had derived from that idolatry, would have more substantial cause for mourning, when their gains and their glory were all taken away together. For the gold of the calves would be sent to the king of Assyria, as a present, or a part of the spoil, of the conquered nation: and this would turn to the shame of the doting idolaters; who took counsel to worship dead images that could not protect themselves, in preference to the living, true, and Almighty God. The word rendered priests is Chemarim; these were certain idolatrous priests, who were clothed in black, when they offered sacrifices. (Marg. Ref.)

Jareb. (Note, v. 13, 14.) 'There it probably means 'Tiglath-pilezer, unto whom Menahem betook himself 'for safety; and here it seems to denote Shalmaneser, who 'took the Israelites under his protection, by making them 'tributaries.' (Lowth.)

V. 7, 8. Perhaps Hoshea the last king of Israel was here meant. After various revolutions and interregnums, that kingdom seemed in a hopeful way of regaining tranquillity and prosperity under his government: but these promising appearances resembled those airy bubbles, that form the foam on the top of the water; and they soon vanished and came to nothing by the slaughter of the king. Then the high places of Aven, (or Bethaven,) would be destroyed: and whilst thorns and thistles overgrew their desolated altars; the terrified worshippers would call upon the hills and mountains to crush or cover them from impending and more tremendous vengeance. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9—11. The disposition of Israel had, in succeeding ages, resembled that of the Benjamites in the days of Gibeah, (ix. 9.) The men of Gibeah stood to what they had done, and the Benjamites stood by them in it: and thus Israel had always obstinately persisted in the most atrocious abominations. Though the last battle in Gibeah almost destroyed the tribe of Benjamin: yet it did not overtake and extirpate the children of iniquity: for many still remained from age to age in Israel, to copy that vile example. The Lord had therefore formed a determined purpose to punish them. The people of Assyria, with their allies, would gather at his call against them; when by their idolatry they had bound themselves for slavery, as the oxen are confined to labour, up and down the two furrows of the field; (the worship of the calves at Dan and Bethel, seems to be intended.) (Marg.) Ephraim indeed was like a heifer, who had been taught and loved to tread out the corn; which was not hard labour, and was attended with the liberty of eating it: that is, the Israelites loved the privilege and temporal advantages of being the people of God, but they were not disposed to labour or self-denial in his service. By milder discipline God had attempted to train them to obedience, as the husbandman gently causes the yoke to pass upon the fair neck of the young heifer, to prepare her for the work: but, as that did not effect the purpose, he would reduce them to great hardships, like those endured by beasts of burden: and even Judah and the whole house of Jacob would be brought into bondage by the Assyrians and Chaldeans, as if they were set to plow and to break the clods; seeing they had quarrelled with the easy yoke of God's commands.

trust in thy way, [r] in the multitude of thy mighty men.

14 Therefore [s] shall a tumult arise among thy people, [t] and all thy fortresses shall be spoiled, [u] as Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel in the day of battle: [x] the mother was dashed in pieces upon her children.

15 So [y] shall Beth-el do unto you because of *your great wickedness: [z] in a morning shall the king of Israel utterly be cut off.

Is. xvi. 14.

V. 12, 13. No way remained to the Israelites and Jews of escaping these judgments, except by sowing to themselves in righteousness. Repentance and conversion from sin, attendance on God's ordinances, and obedience to his commandments, would be like sowing good seed, which would yield an increase for their own advantage; and in this way, though they could not merit any thing from God, they might hope and wait for his merciful acceptance, as their harvest. But their hearts resembled fallow ground, hard and unbroken, and covered with noxious weeds: so that, without they were humbled and broken for sin, and cleansed from vile affections, they could not receive the good seed of God's word, nor bring forth the fruits of righteousness: but self-examination, watchfulness, prayer, confession, and mortification of sin, would break up this fallow ground, and eradicate these weeds. They had too long delayed this needful duty; and it was full time for them to seek the Lord, and his favour and help by earnest prayer: thus they might expect, that he would give the increase by the influences of his Spirit, and come and rain righteousness upon them. But on the contrary they had long bestowed abundant pains in the practice of wickedness; as if they had plowed and sowed, in order to get a crop of iniquity: and in consequence they had eaten the fruit of their own lies and hypocrisy. They trusted in their own projects and heathen alliances, and in numerous and valiant forces: but as they had neglected God and his service, these confidences would certainly fail them.

V. 14, 15. Intestine divisions and foreign invaders, would soon combine to ruin Israel. All their strong holds would fall into the hands of the enemy, and their inhabitants would be treated with the same cruelty, with which Shalman, (or Shalmaneser,) had desolated Beth-arbel, when he took it by assault, and slew indiscriminately all the inhabitants. Nor could Bethel and its idols do any thing for them better than this; for it was the source and substance of their enormous wickedness. And after a night of adversity, when they thought the morning of prosperity was come, under the government of Hosea, he would suddenly be cut off, and the whole people left defenceless in the hands of their enemies. 'Beth-arbel, '(or Arbela,) was a place in Armenia, famous afterward 'for the defeat of Darius—by Alexander. The Hebrew 'reads, because of the evil of your evil. That language 'expresses the greatness of any thing by repeating the 'word over again. The same expression is used by St. 'Paul, (Rom. vii. 13;) "that sin might become exceed-"ingly sinful;" 'that is, hereby it might appear how full 'of evil our natural corruption is.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They who only seek their own credit or profit, in religious duties, will be accounted unfruitful branches of the true Vine; for, all that abide in Christ bring forth fruit to the glory of God and the benefit of mankind. Alas, in this view, how empty a vine is the visible Church even to this very day! How little of the genuine fruits of righteousness grow upon it!—Human nature is propense to multiply crimes, as God multiplies his favours: and a fruitful land, a good estate, or a flourishing trade commonly occasions more pride, sensuality, and impiety. They who attempt to share their hearts between God and Mammon will surely be found faulty, and condemned as hypocrites: for we should give the Lord the whole; and then, love others for his sake, and according to his commandment: and so love him in all, and do all to his glory. Every idolized dependence will soon be torn from those who fear not God: and what indeed could a king, or even a kingdom do for those who have him for their enemy?—Hypocrisy, perjury, or treachery in oaths and covenants, converts the most sacred observances into the vilest crimes, and corrupts the very fountain of law and justice. They who rejoice in iniquity, prepare terror and sorrow for themselves; for all created glories are transient, and soon depart, pass into other hands, and leave those ashamed who confided in them. All earthly prosperity is but a collection of bubbles, and is soon destroyed like the foam upon the water: and soon will haughty sinners call upon the rocks and mountains to hide them from the face of that angry Judge, whom they now despise, when he speaks to them in the mild language of a merciful Saviour. In every age, in the visible Church, we meet with those who copy and emulate the crimes and infamy of the most atrocious sinners of ancient times: nor can any judgments on earth so extirpate the children of iniquity, that none shall be found who do evil and stand to it. But the Lord will punish all such; and their sins will form those chains, in which they shall be bound, and delivered up into the hands of their enemies. They who love only the privileges of the Gospel, or the temporal advantages of religious profession, and do not love to draw in the yoke of evangelical obedience, and will not be induced to it by fatherly corrections, must expect to meet with severe treatment: and such as refuse the liberty of God's service, must fall into the drudgery and oppression of Satan and their own lusts. However men may deceive themselves, it is most certain, that "accordingly as a man sows, "so also shall he reap:" and though our "sowing unto "righteousness" be not deserving of a reward; yet it will abound to our own account, and we shall reap in mercy. Men should then be exhorted to break up the fallow ground of their hearts, that they may be prepared to receive the seed of God's word, and to give it root and nourishment, that it may produce an abundant increase. It is time that sinners entered upon this: for none can tell how soon the seed time may be lost, and the hopes of the harvest gone, for ever: and though the Lord alone can "come and rain righteousness upon us:" yet it is our duty to use all means, in spiritual as well as natural things. As for those who plow wickedness and reap iniquity, in their unjust gains or forbidden pleasures; they will soon "eat of the fruit of their own ways, and be filled with "their own devices." Nor can their confidence in their own abilities, or in the multitude of the mighty or the renowned that are of their mind, protect them against the wrath of God. Alas, what exquisite miseries do men's sins bring upon them, even in this world! Are nations rendered a scene of tumult and bloodshed? Are strongholds spoiled, and women and children murdered? Are kings cut off, and their subjects enlaved? Sin alone hath done all this mischief, and these are but a small specimen of its dreadful triumphs! Let us then look to, and be thankful for, "the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the "world."

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1. In the infancy of the nation, when Israel was weak and enslaved in Egypt, the Lord manifested his special love of him, acknowledged him for his son, and called him out of Egypt by the hand of Moses and Aaron. As this was typical of the true Israel's conversion from the bondage of sin and Satan, to the liberty of God's children, through his peculiar love to them; so it also prefigured the bringing up of the only begotten Son of God out of Egypt, whither he had been driven by Herod's cruelty; that he might in the Lord's land perform the whole work of our redemption. (Matt. ii. 15.) 'This 'prophecy is applied by St. Matthew, to our Lord's return 'out of Egypt:—and the literal sense of the words does 'more properly belong to him than to Israel: which is 'observable in many other prophecies, which can but im-'properly be applied to those of whom they were first spok-'en, and, taking them in their true and genuine sense, are 'only fulfilled in Christ.' (Lowth.)

V. 2. The perverse and ungrateful Israelites, after their deliverance, refused to hearken to the Lord's prophets, who called them to cleave to his service; nay, they were rather impelled by resentment and enmity to more decided rebellion and apostacy, and to run into various kinds of idolatry. In like manner the Jews afterwards walked contrary to the preaching of Christ and his apostles.

V. 3, 4. The Lord had all along treated Israel, even the revolted ten tribes, with the tenderness of a nursing mother to her young child. He upheld them from falling, carried them above their difficulties, and taught them how they ought to walk in order to please him; 'as a mother 'doth teach her child to go, leading it by the arms.' He had also healed their breaches and afflictions, though they did not know or thankfully acknowledge him as their healer. Indeed he still drew them towards him, not by those violent methods, which are used with brutes, but by such cogent arguments, such tender persuasions, such constraining motives and obligations, as were suited to work on the understanding, will, and affections of rational creatures. Especially his continued love towards them was suited to draw them to repentance, confidence, and obedience: for he not only plentifully provided for their wants, but carefully removed every impediment to their comfortable enjoyment of his bounty; as the husbandman takes off the yoke and unmuzzles the ox, which hath finished his labour, as well as lays the provender before him.

V. 5—7. The Israelites had a strong attachment to Egypt: they would not however be sent back as a nation, to that house of bondage, (though many individuals fled thither;) but the Assyrian king would acquire the dominion over them; seeing they refused to return to the worship of JEHOVAH: and his authority would be that of the sword, abiding on, and desolating, their cities and villages, and devouring the inhabitants. This would be the effect of their own counsel, in refusing submission to the Assyrians, and in seeking help from the Egyptians. Though they were called the Lord's people, they were bent to backslide or apostatize from him. This was the constant bias of their minds, and they were obstinate in it; so that though the prophets earnestly called them to the worship of the most high God, none of them would exalt or honour him, but all of them preferred their worthless idols to him.

8 [u] How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? how shall I deliver thee, Israel? how shall I make thee as [x] Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim? [y] Mine [z] heart is turned within me, my repentings are kindled together.

9 I will [a] not execute the fierceness of mine anger, I will not [b] return to destroy Ephraim: [c] for I am God, and not man; [d] the holy One in the midst of thee: and I will not enter into the city.

10 They shall [e] walk after the LORD: [f] he shall roar like a lion: when he shall roar, then the children [g] shall tremble from the [h] west.

11 They shall tremble as a bird [i] out of Egypt, and [k] as a dove out of the land of Assyria: [l] and I will place them in their houses, saith the LORD.

12 Ephraim [m] compasseth me about with lies, and the house of Israel with deceit: but [n] Judah yet [o] ruleth with God, and is faithful with the * saints.

Bent to, &c. "My people are in suspense because of "their backsliding from me." 'Either they are in con-'tinual anxiety, because of God's displeasure; or, they 'are irresolute, and halt between God and their idols.' (Lowth.)—Perhaps the invitation, which Hezekiah sent to the ten tribes, to come and join in celebrating the passover, may be alluded to.

V. 8—11. Strict justice demanded, that Israel should be rendered as Admah and Zeboim, which were destroyed with Sodom and Gomorrah, by fire from heaven; so that none escaped, and the place where they had stood was rendered ever after a monument of divine vengeance. But mercy objected to this righteous severity: for how could the Lord give up his Israel to such universal and dire destruction? Speaking after the manner of men, his bowels were moved, and his heart pained and even turned within him at the thought; so that his repentings, or disposition to relent and mitigate the sentence, were excited along with his holy indignation. He would not therefore execute the fierceness of his anger, in so undistinguishing a manner, nor return by one stroke after another utterly to destroy Ephraim. For being God and not man, of infinite perfection in wisdom and mercy, as well as in justice and holiness, he knew how to moderate and regulate his indignation, and to glorify all his attributes in his dealings with them. He had dwelt in the midst of them, as the Holy One of Israel; and it would not consist with his glory to destroy them as he had done Sodom, without leaving any remnant, or to make them perpetual desolations: he would not enter Samaria, or their other cities, in this tremendous manner; some of the people should survive the catastrophe, and be incorporated among the Jews, or otherwise be brought into the Church, who in future times would walk after the Lord. When his terrible and powerful voice should be heard among them, as the roaring of a lion, Israel in after-times would tremble throughout their dispersions, like the birds of the air, or the dove, the most timid of them: and being thus brought to fear and to submit to him, they would be reinstated in the Church, and perhaps in their own land. This evidently looks forward to the future conversion and restoration of Israel; as well as to the times subsequent to the Babylonish captivity, and to the days of Christ and his apostles. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. The religious professions and services of Israel were lies and hypocrisy, with which they compassed and offended God. But in Judah the princes wrought with God and ruled for him; and as regard was paid to his laws, they had great influence with him: and the people were faithful with the saints, or followers of their pious progenitors. This was probably written at the time of Hezekiah's reformation, and was an intimation of his deliverance from Sennacherib's invasion.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The care of the Lord over us from our earliest infancy should induce us to grateful obedience and holy worship; and it will tend to our condemnation if it have not this effect. But his love to his Church of redeemed sinners from the beginning, and especially in giving his Son to become incarnate, and to pass through hardships and sufferings, from his birth in the stable to his death upon the cross, should principally encourage our hopes, and engage our affections to him. Yet, alas, many who are favoured with abundant means of becoming acquainted with this love of God our Saviour, turn away from him as if he were an enemy, and prefer their lusts and idols to his unsearchable riches and unspeakable kindness! They indeed alone are truly happy, whom he teaches by his Spirit, upholds by his power, and causes to walk in his ways. They do not always know at first to whom they are indebted for these beginnings of healing and salvation; but they will at length acknowledge him as the Author and Finisher of that blessed work. He neither finds sinners willing to be saved in his humbling holy method, nor does he force salvation upon them against their wills: but he draws them in the most rational, tender, and persuasive manner; rendering his arguments, warnings, motives, and encouragements efficacious by the influences of his Holy Spirit. In the Gospel he sets his rich provisions before them; and by his grace he takes away prejudice, pride, the carnal mind, and the love and dominion of sin, and creates an appetite for the blessed feast; and so they feed and live for ever. But they who have only outward advantages, "not knowing "that the goodness of God leadeth them to repentance," proceed with a hard and impenitent heart, to treasure up wrath against the approaching day of wrath. For miseries in various forms await those who refuse to return to God, and their own counsels only serve to bring ruin upon them. —But, alas, how bent to backsliding are even God's professing people! Notwithstanding the labours of ministers to call people to the service of the most High, there are but few who cordially honour him, and give him the throne in their hearts. So that he might justly give up even a great part of the visible Church, as he did Admah and Zeboim; nay, it is of his mercy, that we are not all consumed. But his compassions are free and infinite: he pities the miseries, forgives the sins, moderates the corrections of his offending people, and seems to repent of his severity towards them. How then should we repent of our ingratitude to him! He will not destroy his Church; nor leave his enemies to triumph; for he is the unchangeable God, and not like mutable man: and he can execute vengeance on hypocrites, and correct his offending children, without inflicting his fierce anger by an indiscriminate destruction. But whilst this Holy One, who deigns to dwell in the midst of his Church, roars like a lion against the workers of iniquity; true Israelites tremble before him, but do not flee from him. Thus fearing his wrath, confessing their guilt, and trusting in his mercy, they will be restored to the enjoyment of his favour; and will have the tokens of his acceptance, whilst the deceits and lies of hypocrites shall be exposed and punished. It is peculiarly honourable to him, when we obey his commands, serve him in our respective places, and are faithful amongst his saints, in times of general apostacy: and "them who thus honour "God, he will honour, but such as despise him shall be "lightly esteemed."

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1, 2. Israel acted as foolishly in seeking help from idols and idolators, as a man would do, that should seek to satisfy his hunger, by greedily pursuing the noxious east-wind, which could only disappoint him. But indeed they continually multiplied delusions, which served to increase their desolations: for after having made a treaty with the Assyrians, they violated it, sending quantities of oil into Egypt, to purchase the assistance of that people, in shaking off the Assyrian yoke. Indeed the Lord had also a controversy with Judah in this matter: though they adhered to the family of David and the priesthood of Aaron, and did not publicly commit idolatry; yet they were prone to form heathen alliances, instead of wholly trusting in God. For this he intended to punish them, in a manner suitable to the offence; which he afterwards did by Sennacherib's invasion: though he did not give them up to the Assyrians, as he did the ten tribes.

V. 3—6. Having mentioned Jacob, (including the whole nation descended from that patriarch,) the prophet showed how contrary their conduct, in trusting to an arm of flesh, was to that of their believing progenitor. As a token that he would afterwards struggle hard for the birth-right and the blessing of God, he even in the womb took his brother by the heel, as if contending for the privilege of primogeniture; and afterwards, being strong in faith, he had power as a prince with God, when he prevailed with him for deliverance from the armed force of his enraged brother. He was at that time in no condition to resist, and he had no place to flee unto; and he sought no other succour than that of God. But he wrestled with him, and had power over him whom Moses called a Man, as he appeared in human form, but who was the Angel of God's presence, the eternal Son of God, yea, GOD, with whom by his strength he prevailed; and he would not depart until he blessed him. His wrestling was only the sign of that spiritual conflict by which he obtained this honourable victory, even fervent prayer; for he wept, (for the sins that had first enraged his brother's anger, and for the sorrows with which he was then oppressed;) and made supplication to him, even to the Angel, for deliverance from his brother. (Notes, Gen. xxxii.) This very person, called a man by Moses, (who yet records that the name of the place was called Peniel, or the face of God;) and by Hosea, GOD and the ANGEL, yea, the LORD GOD of Hosts; found Jacob at Bethel, and there spake to him, and to his remotest posterity with him. And who could this be, to whom these several titles belonged, but He, who appearing in the Form of God, afterwards took on him the Form of a Servant, and was made in the likeness of man? (Marg. Ref.) The Lord spake twice to Jacob in Bethel, but the first time especially seems intended; when God appeared, from above the ladder to him as he lay asleep beneath, having fled from the face of Esau; when he gave most gracious promises to him and his posterity; when Jacob called the place Bethel, or the house of God, and made a solemn vow to him. Afterwards he appeared to him at Peniel; and at length again he sent him to Bethel, to pay his vow that he had made in the day of his distress. (Marg. Ref.) But his descendants, regardless of all vows, warnings, and obligations, set up even at Bethel their golden calf, and turned that house of God into a house of vanity by their vile idolatry. Yet it was the LORD of hosts, or armies, which Jacob had met with in these places, who was to be known by that memorial to all generations: and he was as able to deliver them, as he had been to deliver their ancestor; so that they needed not seek help from an arm of flesh. Let them therefore turn to him, and keep mercy and judgment, or righteousness, and wait on God continually, and they should at length experience his power, mercy, and truth, as Jacob had done. The Jews did this in some measure under Hezekiah, and were marvellously delivered from Sennacherib: but the Israelites, who entirely neglected it, were soon destroyed by Shalmanesar.

V. 7—9. Ephraim prospered, by becoming a merchant. The word signifies a Canaanite: the Israelites conducted trade upon Canaanitish principles, covetously and iniquitously; using false balances, cheating by various artifices, and loving to oppress the poor. Thus they grew rich, and they supposed that providence favoured and approved of them. They ascribed their wealth to their own industry, and thought it a substantial advantage: and though the prophets might condemn them, they were satisfied that they could not be detected in any iniquitous methods of growing rich, that could properly be called sin, or deserve the wrath of God. What was not absolutely to be justified might at least be executed. But the Lord, who as their God had so favoured them, even from their deliverance from Egypt, would drive them from their stately houses, to dwell in mean and moveable tents, as wanderers among the nations; even such tents as were used on the days of the solemn feast of tabernacles. Some indeed interpret this of future mercies in reserve for Israel, notwithstanding their sins; and suppose that the joy of the feast of tabernacles is referred to. (Zech. xiv. 16—19.)

V. 10, 11. The varied means which the Lord had employed by the ministry of his prophets from age to age, greatly aggravated Israel's crimes. They had used parables, illustrations, and similitudes, to explain and enforce their messages; but all to no purpose. It is probable that this was written some time after the inhabitants of Gilead had been carried captive by Tiglath-pilezer, (2 Kings xv. 29.) 'Do ye think that there was more iniquity in the Gilead-'ites that are already carried away captive, than in you? 'Surely the rest of Israel is in the same case; they all lie 'open to the same judgment. They sacrifice to their idols 'in Gilgal also.' (Bp. Hall.) In short, their altars were as numerous as the heaps of dung laid on the plowed field, or of stones gathered out of it.

V. 12—14. The people ought to have remembered the low condition of their progenitor; as well as his plain, honest, industrious character, and his pious confidence in God. When he went into Mesopotamia, (or the country between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris;) he was so destitute, yet so diligent and skilful, that he laid the foundation of his future provision, and even of his family; by serving fourteen years as a shepherd for his two wives, Rachel and Leah, and cheerfully enduring hardship all that time; from which low original all their subsequent prosperity arose. And surely they ought not to despise the prophets, when the Lord by his prophet Moses brought the nation out of Egypt, and preserved them from the destructive rage of Pharaoh. But they had most bitterly provoked his anger, by despising his prophets and abusing his goodness; they should therefore perish in their sins, with their blood upon their own heads: and he would turn upon them the contempt and reproach, which they had cast on him and his servants. (Marg. Ref.) Some think that the passage is connected with the preceding verse, in this manner. Jacob fled to Gilead from Mesopotamia, where he had been a servant and fed Laban's sheep, for his wives, &c. And God by his prophet Moses led Israel to Gilead, when he delivered them from Egyptian bondage. Yet the inhabitants of Gilead which had been thus distinguished were carried away captive: and could Ephraim expect to escape? Mahonaim, where the angels met Jacob, as he returned to Canaan, was in the land of Gilead, (Gen. xxxii. 2. 2 Sam. xvii. 26, 27;) and Peniel, where he

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

They who depend on creatures for safety or felicity, whilst "the wrath of God abideth on them," feed on wind, and follow after the east wind; and the increase of their delusions enhances their miseries. Such, as in some things deserve commendation, are in others to be blamed: and the Lord has many a controversy even with his saints, who are visited with rebukes and corrections according to their doings. We should be followers of the most eminent believers, in their most simple dependence on God, their fervency in persevering prayer, and their most unreserved obedience. We should select for our imitation the most distinguished parts of their conduct, in which they are mentioned with most honour, and most evidently prevailed with God, by their strength of faith and humble expectation. If we have power with the great Angel of the covenant, and lay hold of him and his salvation by vigorous faith, whatever our foes or fears may suggest, or however our sins and sorrows may cause us to join tears with our supplications, we shall certainly have power with God: for "He and the Father are One:" "he is the "LORD God of hosts, the LORD is his memorial:" he hath all hearts in his hands, and he can easily cause our most malignant enemies to be at peace with us. Let us then cease from man, and set ourselves to wrestle with him for the blessings, determined never to give over till we prevail. Let us seek him in his ordinances, and hear him speak to us by all his promises and precepts to his ancient servants: and may we be enabled to turn to him, as our Portion, to keep and execute judgment and mercy towards all men, and to wait on our God continually.

V. 7—14.

In general, they who neglect piety, are exceedingly defective in their moral conduct: and lawful, honourable, and useful as commerce must be allowed to be, when properly conducted, yet too many called Christians are mere Canaanites in this respect; the balances of deceit are in their hands, and they love to oppress. They think every measure sanctified by which men grow rich; they prosper in the world, ascribe it to their own prudence, and spend their wealth upon themselves: and if they can keep up their credit with men, or excuse themselves by the maxims and customs of the commercial world, or of others in their own line of trade, their consciences are satisfied. Their deviations are trivial and justifiable; they are not worthy to be called transgressors against God; and such as condemn them are uncharitable enthusiasts, or men that know nothing of the world. But however God may wink at such things, in the days and places of total ignorance, he will assuredly mark and punish them in those who profess his truth and frequent his ordinances; and who have been favoured with the multiplied visions and similitudes of the prophets, by the parables of Christ, the instructions of his apostles, and the stated ministry of the word. Iniquity in such places is peculiarly hateful; and it is often connected with idolatry, superstition, hypocrisy, or open impiety. It is better to endure the hardest labour in the lowest menial situation, under poverty and oppression, than to grow rich by sin: and we shall best form a judgment of our own conduct, by comparing it with that of ancient believers, in their approved actions, and in similar circumstances. None will despise prophesyings, but they who know not what things God hath in former ages done for his Church, by the ministry of his prophets; and he still honours, and works by his faithful ministers, who endeavour by every means to bring his people acquainted with his truth and will. All therefore who despise them, despise him that sent them, and provoke him to anger most bitterly; they will perish with their blood upon their own heads, except they repent of this their wickedness; and the Lord will cause the reproach, cast on him, to return and rest upon them.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1, 2. When Ephraim was little in his own estimation, and spake in a humble diffident manner of himself; and when he feared the Lord, trembled at his word, or lest he should offend him and forfeit his protection, he then grew considerable in Israel. Joshua, the conqueror of Canaan, descended from Ephraim; and from his time, that tribe gained the ascendency, in the northern parts of the land, and preserved it, till Jeroboam, an Ephraimite, became king of Israel: and then the kingdom of the ten tribes was frequently called Ephraim. But when Ahab and the succeeding kings, set up the worship of Baal, this prosperity declined; and the kingdom in general, and the tribe in particular, became like a criminal condemned to die, or a man languishing under a mortal disease. Yet nothing could induce the people to renounce idolatry. When Jehu had destroyed Baal, they adhered to the golden calves, and lavished their treasures, and employed their ingenuity in framing other idols: and when these were taken from them, they made others in their stead. The kings, and priests, and other zealous worshippers, required those who brought sacrifices to "kiss "the calves." (Marg. Ref.) By a peculiar arrangement, the word for men is, in the original, next to that for calves. "The sacrificers, a man, the calves shall kiss." That man (Adam,) whom "God made in his own image "and likeness," nay, man favoured with the oracles of God, should degrade himself by kissing, as an act of adoration and love, the lifeless image of a mean brute, is a wonderful proof of stupidity and depravity! Thus Cicero describes a statue of Hercules as having its mouth and chin worn something smoother, because they (the worshippers,) used not only to adore it, with prayers and thanksgivings, but also to kiss it!—Some render it, "Let the sacrificers "of human, kiss the calves." But it does not appear, that man sacrifices were offered in the worship of the calves.

V. 3, 4. To punish these abominable idolatries, the state of Ephraim, like his goodness, (vi. 4,) would be as the morning cloud, the early dew, the chaff before the whirlwind, or the smoke out of the chimney; i. e. violently and speedily made to vanish and disappear. For after all that the Lord had done for Israel, from their deliverance out of Egypt, they ought to have acknowledged and worshipped no other god, but him alone; for none but he was, or could be, a Saviour, or Deliverer of his people, from temporal or eternal ruin: (Note, Is. xliii. 10, 11.) This may also be understood as a prophecy of what the Lord would do for them in future times.

V. 5—8. The Lord had acknowledged, regarded, and provided for, Israel in the wilderness; when otherwise they must have perished by thirst, because it was a land of great drought. Yet when they entered Canaan, and were like cattle placed in a good pasture, they gratified their appetites to excess, and their hearts were lifted up in pride. This caused them to forget God and their obligations to him, and so they apostatized to gross idolatry. Therefore he would meet them in vengeance, with the fierceness of a leopard that watches by the way to seize upon the travellers; with the fury of a savage bear enraged by the loss of her young; with the force of a lion, or as the most terrible beast that inhabited their forests. 'They never venture 'to fire on a young bear, when the mother is near: for if 'the cub drop, she becomes enraged to a degree little short 'of madness; and if she get sight of the enemy, will only 'quit her revenge with her life.' (Cook's Voyage.)

V. 9. "One hath destroyed thee, O Israel," (that is, "Thou art destroyed.") Thou shouldest have trusted in me for thy help: but having forsaken me, thou art destroyed. Israel did not trust in God for help, and Sennacherib triumphed over them: Hezekiah and Judah did trust in God for help, and were delivered from him. This seems the construction and sense of this verse: and the meaning is nearly the same as in our translation. "O "Israel, one hath destroyed thee, but in me is thy help." Israel need not blame others for his ruin; for he had destroyed himself: but he could not save himself, his help was in and from God alone.

V. 10, 11. The Lord had all along undertaken to be Israel's King and Protector: and the judges that he raised up, delivered the people, by his authority and immediate help. But where was there any that could save them in all their cities; or of all their rulers, which they had set up for themselves? In the time of Samuel they would have a king: and God in anger granted their rebellious request, and gave them Saul, who both during his life and at his death, was the occasion of great calamities to them. And similar had the case been with the kings of Israel, from Jeroboam's revolt to the ruin of the kingdom of the ten tribes by the death of Hoshea their last king. This last event seems especially alluded to. "I will give thee a "king in mine anger, and take him away in my wrath." from age to age, which was, as it were, bound up in bags, and laid by in a secure place to be produced against the day of account. (Marg, Ref.) The affairs of the nation were coming to a crisis, as the hour of travail approaches to the pregnant woman, and her sorrows can in no wise be avoided. But the event would be that of a woman who dies without being delivered; for the people would make no more efforts to rescue themselves from their difficulties, than a dead child could do. They were so foolish, that they continued in a situation which must certainly end in ruin, without attempting any reformation or repentance: so that the souls of individuals and the state of the nation would perish together, like the mother and child in the case alluded to. They ought indeed to use endeavours most earnestly, without delay to extricate themselves, before it was too late; but they foolishly neglected or postponed every means!

V. 14. The predictions of the ruin of Israel, as a nation, were connected with an intimation of a merciful and powerful interposition of God to save a remnant of them, as from death and the grave: yet this was but a shadow of the ransom of the true Israel, by the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ, from the wrath of God, the death of sin, the power of Satan, and finally from death and the grave itself at the last day. When Christ died, and was buried, and rose again, he, as it were, disquieted the dominion of death, and was the plague of that king of terrors; and at length he will be the destruction of both death and the grave. This was absolutely determined, and would certainly be accomplished, notwithstanding Israel's sins and miseries. The Lord would not repent of this his purpose and promise: he would even hide repentance from his eyes, as determined not to look at it. The Septuagint renders the middle clause: "Where is thy "vengeance, O death? Where is thy sting, O grave? or "O hell?" And the apostle seems to have thus understood the passage, though he does not quote it exactly. (1 Cor. xv. 55.) The word translated I will be, is rendered in many versions, Where, both here and in the tenth verse, "Where is thy king?" and only the transposition of a single letter is requisite fully to authorize this construction.

V. 15, 16. Though Ephraim (whose name signifies fruitfulness,) had been so fruitful in respect of the numbers of the people; yet he would certainly be destroyed by the Assyrians, whom the Lord would send against them: as the east wind from the wilderness blights the spreading tree; or as when the springs from beneath dry up, and it withers for lack of moisture. Thus his fountain would be dried up; and his treasures, and choice vessels of precious metal and rich furniture, would be spoiled. For when the land had previously been ravaged, Samaria would be desolated, by the most inhuman murder, even of the women and children. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—8.

Humility, with the fear of God, and a dependence on his mercy, truth, and power, forms the grand requisite for honour and advancement, in the service of Israel's God and King. But they who exalt themselves shall be abased; and such as forsake God, to follow idols and iniquities, give a fatal wound to their own prosperity, and are the murderers of their own souls. The way of transgression is downhill, and they who begin to descend, often sin on more and more, till they come into the pit of destruction. —Many would spare no expense in religion, provided it might be regulated according to their own understanding, to suit their own inclinations, and not according to the word of God. In this case they would adore the work of the craftsman, or the creature of their own imagination, with abundant reverence, devotion, and affection; and with as much stupidity, as the Israelites prostrated themselves before, and kissed, the dead image of a calf! But every fleeting object in nature might preach to such men the vanity of their religion, and the transient continuance of their prosperity. Surely, no one, who has read the Bible, should acknowledge any other God, than him from whom cometh our salvation! And they, that have experienced the power of converting grace, and have walked with God in the liberty of the Gospel, will be effectually preserved from such delusions: for none can be entitled to our worship, who cannot save us from all enemies and evils: and there is no other Saviour, but the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, into whose name Christians are baptized. He takes care of his people, in their lowest estate, and preserves them in every barren desert and land of drought through which they pass. But when sinners under terror of conscience, or in difficult circumstances, obtain ease or prosperity, and then run into excess, are lifted up in pride, or lulled into carnal security, and so forget the Lord, they may expect to be punished with marked severity. This ingratitude, so natural to fallen man, excites his heaviest indignation, and turns his kindness into jealousy, which burns most fiercely against the objects of it. He can torture the inmost soul, and, as it were, rend the caul of the heart of his rebellious and apostate worshippers: nor can words describe, or similitudes illustrate, the anguish which he can excite in the heart and conscience.

V. 9—16.

We have all destroyed ourselves, and should never so speak of God's purposes, or Satan's temptations, or any other subject, as to forget that our own wilful apostacy and rebellion have exposed us to that deserved wrath, which must have terminated in eternal ruin, had not mercy intervened. Nor can we have any help but from the Lord: and blessed be his name, in him is effectual help; and for us, if we are willing to accept of it. All things are now ready, the mercies of God are infinite, his redemption all-sufficient, his invitations free and unencumbered, his promises exceedingly great and precious; his wisdom, power, and truth are concerned to accomplish them to every believer: he will be the King, the Protector and Ruler, of all who believe, and he will save them completely and for ever: but all other schemes for obtaining safety and eternal life, are as vain as Israel's hope in their kings and judges; whom they rebelliously set up, when they rejected the Lord, and "would not have him to reign over them." What we inordinately desire, will perhaps be given us in anger: and whether granted, or withheld, or taken from us, will be the occasion of wrath and tribulation to our souls.—The sins of unbelievers, with all their aggravations, are laid up in the omniscience of God, as if hid among his treasures: and who can conceive what a long and heavy account there stands out against each of us! Except therefore sinners repent and believe the Gospel, anguish will soon come upon them, as the sorrows of a travailing woman, from which there will be no deliverance. He is then most unwise, who doth not make haste to flee from the wrath to come. For, however men may be alarmed and affected, unless they enter in at the strait gate, and become penitent believers, "new created in Christ Jesus "unto good works," they will as surely perish as the child does whose mother's womb becomes its grave. But the great Redeemer is able and willing to extricate those that call upon him, out of this and every difficulty. He hath paid the ransom of our souls with his blood, and begun his triumphs by his resurrection from the dead: and all, who accept and bring forth the fruits of his salvation, may be assured that he will also ransom them from the power of the grave, and redeem them from death; until he hath forced the devouring monster to disgorge his prey, and till he have become the destruction of the grave, and "mortality be swallowed up of life." Then will the millions of the redeemed rejoice and praise the Lord, for having destroyed the last enemy, and for having restored them, in body and soul, to a glorious immortality. These are true and faithful sayings: for the Lord hath promised, and "repentance will be hid from his eyes." But without fruitfulness in good works, springing from the Spirit of Christ, all other fruitfulness will be found as empty as the uncertain riches of the world: the wrath of God will wither its branches: the springs that watered it shall become dry, and it shall be spoiled, and come to nothing.—In short, tribulation and anguish belong to those who have rebelled against God, and their woes will be far more terrible than any that are experienced in that cruelty and carnage, which often attend the storming of populous cities. From such miseries and murders, and from sin the fruitful parent of all sorrow, good Lord, we beseech thee to deliver us!

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1—3. This chapter is very different from the general tenour of the preceding prophecy; and perhaps it was delivered after the reduction of Samaria, and the ruin of the kingdom of Israel. Some penitents would be found among the scattered remnant, who would need encouragement. Others might be brought to repentance by means of their afflictions: and these exhortations, and promises, imply predictions of future events to the nation of Israel and to the Church of God. (Marg. Ref.)—Israel is here exhorted to return to the LORD; JEHOVAH had always been known as their God; and they might expect all blessings from him by virtue of the covenant made with their fathers. They must renounce their sins and idols, by true repentance, by faith in his mercy and grace through the promised Redeemer, and by diligently attending on his worship and service. Thus they would be recovered from that ruined state, into which they had fallen by their iniquities and idolatries. In order to this, they must take (not legal sacrifices, but) words expressive of the desires of their hearts, and with them address the Lord. In order to guide their prayers, the prophet showed them what words suited their case. They first must entreat God to take away all iniquity: (conscious that they could neither expiate, nor subdue their sins;) and beseech him to receive them graciously; to take them of his rich mercy into his family, and to confer on them all the blessings of salvation. Then with their lips they would proclaim his praise, and give him the whole glory of their salvation,

4 I will [l] heal their backsliding, [m] I will love them freely: [n] for mine anger is turned away from him.

5 I will be [o] as the dew unto Israel; [p] he shall * grow as the lily, [q] and † cast forth his roots as Lebanon.

rendering him sacrifices of thanksgiving, far more acceptable than the calves of the stall. At the same time, they must renounce their former heathen alliances and idolatries, and every carnal confidence: and profess that they will no more have recourse to the Assyrians, or attempt to multiply horses from Egypt, in order to resist their foes: that they would no more adore as gods the work of their own hands, or expect help from their idols: but that they would come to the Lord; believing him to be always ready to relieve the destitute, the friendless, the helpless, and unworthy. —The whole forms an important description of the nature and tendency of a sinner's conversion to God through Jesus Christ.

V. 4—8. These verses contain promises in answer to the preceding prayers, whenever Israel should be excited to present them. God would heal Israel's backsliding, or their manifold apostacies and idolatries: he would recal them from their wanderings, pardon their guilt, subdue their evil propensities, speak peace to their consciences, renew their souls, and establish them in holiness; and all this would flow from his free, unmerited mercy and favour. Thus he would show that his righteous anger was turned from them, and that he was perfectly reconciled. Then he would be to them as the refreshing, fructifying dew, which silently distils on the plants and flowers all over the earth. Israel would become a holy people, growing fast, like the lily, which is noted for its beautiful whiteness. Yet as this is only a fading flower, he would also send abroad his roots like a cedar in Lebanon: his branches would become spreading and beautiful as those of the olive-tree, and the savour of his graces would resemble the smell of the odoriferous plants of Lebanon. Thus he would be a most stately, fruitful, and delightful tree, uniting the greatest variety of excellencies: multitudes from all parts of the earth would come to dwell under his shadow, and be converted to the Lord. Being thus revived from the death of sin and misery, the people would grow up to maturity, as the corn ripens for the harvest; they would bear fruit as the vine, and be as delightful to all around them, as the celebrated wines made from the vineyards on the sides of mount Lebanon, which at this day are most excellent. Then Ephraim, who had been joined to idols, would be effectually divorced from them; he would speak as one ashamed of having ever worshipped them, and renounce them with indignation and abhorrence: and the Lord, in his infinite mercy, would hear his prayers and confessions; he observed him become at length humble and penitent; and was ready to give grace and speak peace to him. He would be to him, like a green fir-tree, (large, beautiful, and shady;) in him Ephraim should find all things needful for safety and comfort; and from him would proceed all the pleasant effects of his repentance and faith, and all the sanctifying fruits of his life. The passage seems to predict the conversion of the Jews and incorporated Israelites to Christ, in the apostolic times, and the future conversion of that people. (Marg. Ref.) The exquisitely beautiful poetry of these verses, has excited the warm admiration of all competent judges.

V. 9. The due understanding and improvement of these directions and encouragements, would be a proof of wisdom and prudence: and every wise and prudent man in the things of God, would certainly thus know and improve them. The dealings of the Lord with his people, the doctrines of his word, and the requirements of his law; the ways by which men come to him and walk with him, and the paths in which he walks towards them, are all right, holy, just, wise, merciful, and faithful. This, the righteous (the penitent believer) perceives, and comes to walk with God in them: but obstinate transgressors stumble at every part of his word and providence, and pervert the whole to the increase of their impiety and presumptuous wickedness: and thus they are snared and perish, even by means of those things which in themselves are most excellent and divine.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Sin is the prolific parent of all the misery in the universe, and we should trace all our sorrows to this source. Blessed be God, in this world we may be recovered, how low soever we be fallen by our iniquity: for we are called on to return to the Lord our God, as in "Christ reconciling the world unto himself;" and when by faith we obey this call, we are raised up from the brink of despair and hell, re-instated in the full favour of God, and taught to rejoice in the hope of eternal glory. The words which flow from a contrite heart, are far more pleasing to God, than ten thousands of bullocks and rams; as being uniformly connected with a disposition to "look unto the "Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world." We should not therefore, under any distresses, even when we have fallen by iniquity, turn away from God, but rather turn to him as our only Refuge and Salvation. We should first beseech him to teach us what to ask, and how to ask: and when the words of the Holy Spirit correspond with our desires, we should take them with us, and present them before the Lord, that it may be done unto us according to them. We must especially be earnest with him to take away all our iniquity: if that be pardoned we are happy; as nothing but sin can prevent our receiving all good from our gracious God: and surely the whole glory of our salvation, and every possible expression of praise and gratitude, are justly due to our merciful Deliverer; and we can never refuse him the cheap but honourable sacrifice of the calves of our lips. But the true penitent will also evince his sincerity by renouncing his former sins and carnal confidences: he does not want such sources of satisfaction or such refuges of lies; since he has learned to trust in the tender love and compassion of that God, "in whom the "fatherless findeth mercy," and who "withholds no good "thing from them that walk uprightly." They who thus come before God, will surely find him ready to heal their backslidings, how great and many soever they have been: he will love them freely, and turn away all his indignation from them: he will refresh their souls with the dew of his grace; he will render them holy, amiable, steadfast, fruitful, and useful: and others will repair to them, and grow up into the experience and fruitfulness of the Gospel, through their converse, example, and prayers. Thus the cause of God revives in one place or another, from time to time; believers ripen for heaven, or grow more serviceable on earth; God is glorified, the Church increased, and sinners saved. Still the Lord waits to be gracious, and he observes with pleasure the broken hearted penitent; he is ready to refresh every weary soul; and to make those joyful and fruitful, who were most barren and disconsolate; for "from him is all our fruit found." May he give us that wisdom and prudence, which lead to the knowledge, experience, and practice of these things; may we learn to walk in the right ways of God, as his righteous servants; and may none of us, being disobedient and unbelieving, stumble at the word of his grace.

BOOK OF JOEL.

It is uncertain at what time Joel prophesied: some think he predicted those calamities which Amos lamented, (Am. vii:) others, that he lived afterwards. He prophesied to Judah exclusively; whether before or after the captivity of Israel. He foretold or described a terrible judgment on the land, by locusts and drought; which has also been considered as typical of the calamities that were about to be brought on the nation by the Chaldean armies and other invaders. These predictions were attended with earnest exhortations to solemn fasting, repentance, and prayer, and with promises of returning peace and prosperity. The conclusion contains prophecies of the glorious times that were coming under the Gospel-dispensation, and of the righteous judgments to be executed on all the enemies of God and his Church. In this he coincides with the other prophets; who, (with perhaps the single exception of Jonah,) all more clearly predict, or more obscurely intimate, these great events. But the most remarkable prophecy in Joel, is that which the apostle Peter quoted on the day of Pentecost, and which is more than once referred to in the New Testament. (Comp ii. 28—32. Acts ii. 16—21. Rom. x. 13—16.) The effects of the Gospel, as the ministration of the Spirit, both among Jews and Gentiles; and the consequences of opposing it, to the Jewish nation in particular, are here foretold in the fullest and plainest manner: and the event to this day fully attests Joel's divine inspiration.—The style of this prophet is allowed by the most competent judges, to be exceedingly beautiful: and few remains of ancient poetry (none, except those preserved in the sacred Scriptures,) contain such an assemblage of elegance, pathos, and sublimity, as are found in his writings. Whatever obscurity appears to us, is wholly in the subject; for the language is uncommonly perspicuous: and consequently the critics have proposed much fewer alterations, than in the more concise, sententious, and obscure prophecies of Hosea; nor has our translation of it been exposed to similar objections.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 2, 3. The prophet opened his subject by calling upon the aged men, and all the inhabitants of the land, to attend to the events which were about to take place. None of them could remember such dire calamities, nor had any such befallen Judah since it was a nation. They ought therefore to speak of them to their children, that the account might be transmitted by one generation to another, to warn them not to provoke God to punish them with similar judgments. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. The exact difference between these several species of insects, cannot easily be explained. Probably they made their appearance in succession, at different seasons of the year. Sometimes one, and sometimes another of them, had been used to cause a partial devastation of the fruits of the earth; but on this occasion they followed each other, till they had utterly destroyed the whole. Indeed some think that this was the case for several years together, and that it was an emblem of the repeated invasions and devastations of the Chaldeans. We have no history of the completion of this prophecy; if indeed the passage be not historical rather than prophetical. 'A future event which 'might be averted by repentance is spoken of, as having 'already taken place, to enliven the description, by set-'ting the images before the eye of the reader.' (Bp Newcombe.)

V. 5—7. The prophet, considering the effects of this visitation, called on the drunkards to awake and bewail their miseries. Their sins, and the danger to which their souls were exposed, had failed to rouse them from insensibility: but this judgment was suited to affect them; as it would deprive them of their idolized indulgence, and force them to be sober in the most distressing circumstances. For though these insects were small and easily crushed; yet their unnumbered multitudes would render them as formidable as a mighty and populous nation invading the land. Their teeth, suited to destroy the vegetables and bark the trees, would be more formidable than those of a lion; and they would leave nothing growing, but leafless and naked stems.

V. 8. Judah was here called upon to lament on account of her miseries, as a betrothed virgin, who should be deprived of the intended and beloved husband of her youth, before the completion of her marriage; that is, with exceedingly great and unfeigned sorrow. This intimated how very heavy their calamities would be.

V. 9. Some of the priests would piously lament the suspension of sacred ordinances, on so melancholy an occasion: the rest would naturally mourn over the diminution of their revenues.

V. 11. The husbandmen would be ashamed of their unsuccessful labours, in cultivating their fields and vineyards; as neither their skill nor industry, on which they would be apt to depend, could prevent the most terrible famine: all their expectations would be frustrated, and they confounded for having entertained them.

V. 12. Because. "Surely all joy," &c. The joy of harvest, and all joy in outward things, must cease, during such a famine. (Hab. iii. 17, 18.)

V. 13. 'He shows, that the only means to avoid 'God's wrath, and to have all things restored, is true 'repentance.' The priests, especially those who kept the watches at the temple, are here called on, to set the people an example of humiliation before God. Instead of going to rest, or spending the watches in Psalmody; let them lie all night on the ground in sackcloth, and employ themselves in confessing their sins and deprecating the wrath of God. (2 Sam. xii. 16. 22.) To suppose, that they were only to sleep in sackcloth, instead of their ordinary covering, quite enervates the exhortation.

16 Is not [r] the meat cut off before our eyes, yea, [s] joy and gladness from the house of our God?

17 The * seed is rotten under their clods, the garners are laid desolate, the barns are broken down; for the corn is withered.

18 How do [t] the beasts groan! the herds of cattle are perplexed, because they have no pasture; yea, the flocks of sheep are made desolate.

19 O LORD, [u] to thee will I cry: for [x] the fire hath devoured the † pastures of the wilderness, and the flame hath burned all the trees of the field.

20 The beasts of the field [y] cry also unto thee: for [z] the rivers of waters are dried up, and the fire hath devoured the pastures of the wilderness.

V. 14, 15. The priests no doubt had great influence in appointing fasts, though the authority of the kings was generally interposed. They were not only called upon to lament before God themselves, with every expression of humiliation and repentance; but to appoint and keep holy a solemn season of public fasting and prayer: the elders (or the princes and rulers of the people) were directed to convene at the house of the Lord, to join in humbly deprecating his displeasure, and seeking forgiveness of their sins: and all the people were required to lament, that they ever saw such a day, which seemed to be a time of judgment and vengeance; and of destruction, rather than of correction, from the Almighty. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. Neither priests nor people could now frequent the temple with peace-offerings, or sacrifices of praise, or joyfully celebrate their festivals, as formerly they used to do: they could only come before God to mourn and complain, because of their sins and miseries.

V. 17, 18. A terrible drought, as well as locusts, &c. was predicted or described: and dry hot weather often in those countries precedes the coming of the locusts. The failure of the crops rendered granaries and barns useless: and the unoffending cattle groaned under the calamities inflicted for the sins of men. (Notes, Rom. viii. 18—23.)

V. 19, 20. All the produce of the land was consumed as by fire: so that even the beasts seemed to join the prophet in beseeching God to deliver them from their distresses: and thus they shamed those Jews, who refused to call upon him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The word of God, among its other manifold uses, is intended to explain the dispensations of providence; that the Author, the cause, the support, and the remedy, of every affliction may be made known. What the Lord hath taught us in this school, we should carefully impart to our children; that they may receive the benefit without the anguish, of our salutary chastisements. The most insignificant insects, at God's command, become more tremendous to proud man, than even herds of savage beasts, or armies of hostile invaders; how then should we fear the power of his wrath, who can so easily arm the whole creation against us, or lift up his own heavy hand to crush us at once! The more inordinately men indulge their appetites, the heavier calamities must press upon them: whereas habitual self-denial and temperance prevent the most distressing effects even of impoverishing losses. It is well, if any temporal sufferings serve to awaken the drunkard, the epicure, and the sensualist, to lament for their sins, and to flee from the wrath to come. But what must be the feelings of those who continue insensible, till they fall into that place, where not a drop of water can be procured to alleviate their misery; and where their howling and weeping will be without extenuation, intermission, or hope for evermore? The bitter howlings, the confusion and anguish, the hardships and miseries, which are the effects of extreme famine, should teach us to be thankful for a land of plenty, to be contented with a moderate portion, and to be temperate, kind, and pious in our use of it.

V. 8—20.

We are so dependent upon God in every thing, that no human wisdom or power can provide plenty, when he pleases to send scarcity: without his rain, the seed-corn must perish, the trees of the field must wither, and all our temporal joys must sicken and die: and such judgments are emblems of the great day of retribution, which will soon come as a destruction from the Almighty. Even the brute creation groan under the effects of man's sins; and they seem, in their way, to cry and complain to the Lord, that without their fault they are reduced to perish by hunger and thirst, through the wickedness of their oppressor and tyrant, man! How stupid then are sinners, who are insensible under such judgments, or only lament with a rebellious and unhumbled sorrow! We should never rest in any expressions of mere grief; but should also humble ourselves before God on account of those sins which have provoked his chastening rod. All our other sorrows should lead us to that "godly sorrow, which worketh repentance "unto salvation not to be repented of." We ought chiefly to grieve under outward afflictions, when they deprive us of the comfort and benefit of divine ordinances, or when joy and gladness are cut off from the house of the Lord. No self-denial, humiliation, or continued self-abasement before God, should appear too great, as there is yet hope of forgiveness of our sins and deliverance from everlasting misery. The ministers of God especially should set the example, and use their influence, to promote a spirit of repentance and piety amongst the people. Public solemn seasons of fasting and humiliation, attended with the assembling together of the honourable of the land, as well as of the multitude, to confess their sins, to bow down before God, and to pour out their prayers unto him, are proper means of averting national calamities. And though many will observe them formally, or wholly neglect them; yet the Lord will hear the united prayers of the remnant of his servants, and often for their sakes rescue a guilty nation from impending destruction. They who would excite others to such duties, must take the lead in them, as being greatly affected and desirous of affecting them. Thus individuals will find the comfort of acceptance with God, whatever may become of nations that proceed to greater ungodliness; and they will enjoy their gracious recompense, when the wicked and all their possessions shall be burnt up with the fire of the Lord's indignation.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1—3. (Note, Num. x. 1—10.) The priests were directed to blow the trumpets at the temple; and to alarm the people who assembled there, with the prospect of the near approach of these judgments; that the report might thence be diffused throughout the whole land, and all the inhabitants might tremble at God's word, and be induced to repent and deprecate his displeasure. The Lord was about to execute judgment on a guilty nation, as on a solemn day of vengeance. The visitation by the locusts seems to have been primarily intended: but the calamities preceding, attending, and following the destruction of the city by the Chaldeans, might also be referred to. This approaching day of the LORD would be a day of darkness, &c. and as the morning spread upon the mountains: its light would resemble the faint glimmering of the dawn, which appears on the eastern mountains, and just deducts from the midnight darkness, that obscures the earth in gloomy and cloudy weather. This may refer to the immense multitudes of the locusts, which have often been known to obscure the sun at noon-day, and to render the regions through which they pass, for the time, more dark and dismal, than during the night: or it may describe the state of the people's minds, which were filled with a horror little short of despair. This darkness and horror would result from the invasion of a mighty nation, attended with such effects, as the Jews had never before witnessed, and such as would not occur again for many ages. The progress of this army would resemble that of a conflagration: the lands, on which they had not entered, appeared verdant and fruitful, even as the garden of Eden; but they would make such entire destruction wherever they went, as to leave every place behind them like a barren wilderness.

Ever the like. 'The locusts which plagued Egypt are 'described after the same manner. (Ex. x. 14.) In both 'places we are to take it, as a proverbial expression, to 'set forth the extraordinary greatness of the judgment, 'and not to understand it too strictly, according to the 'grammatical sense of the words.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4, 5. It hath been often observed, that locusts greatly resemble horses in the shape of their heads: the impetuosity of the progress made by these ravagers would be like that of horsemen; their noise heard at the distance of several miles, would be as tremendous as that of chariots of war rattling over the mountains, or like that of a vehement fire consuming combustibles with great crackling and fury; and their progress at the same time so regular, that they would resemble a well-disciplined army upon the march, or attacking the enemy. Many have with admiration observed this to be the case with the immense flights of locusts, which often ravage those eastern regions. (7—9.)

V. 6. Not paleness, which may be occasioned by sickness, or fainting, or slighter terror; but blackness, like that of the countenances of those who are expiring in convulsions, or whose blood is suspended from circulation by some inward or outward violence. The extremity of horror and anguish is intended.

8 Neither shall one thrust another; they shall walk every one in his path: and when they fall upon the *sword, they shall not be wounded.

V. 7—9. 'The particles of similitude here, and in the fourth and fifth verses, show that real locusts are described, and not the Assyrian army.' (Bp. Newcombe.) —'This we lately saw, in our part of the country: for when swarms of locusts came, and filled the lower region of the air, they flew in such order, by the divine appointment, and kept their places as exactly, as when several party-coloured stones are skilfully placed in a pavement so as not to be an hair's breadth out of their several ranks. Every place lies open to them, for they infect not only the fields and the fruits of the earth, but creep into cities, houses, and the most secret recesses.' (Jerome in Lowth.)

V. 10, 11. These figures denote the universal consternation and commotion which these judgments would occasion. (Marg. Ref.) Even the kings, princes, and priests, would be filled with horror, and betray the utmost signs of trepidation; the whole land and all orders of men would be agitated, as by the most tremendous earthquakes, and all that commotion of the elements which attends those destructive convulsions. The authority and influence of the rulers and great men would be suspended, and the constitution unhinged; as if the sun and moon should be darkened, and the stars should withdraw their shining; in which case the natural world would be reduced to the utmost confusion, and chaos would return again. In like manner, on this occasion, the whole of the Jewish nation and its government would be reduced to confusion and darkness. For the Lord was about to muster his great army, to lead them to the assault, give them the victory, and powerfully execute his word. His day would be very terrible, and who could abide it? To which question, the answer doubtless would be: none but those who previously sought refuge in his mercy by penitent faith and prayer. The language here used may well be supposed descriptive of the destruction of Jerusalem, and the desolations of the land by the Chaldeans; and will have a literal accomplishment at the end of the world.

V. 12—14. From these predictions the Lord, by his prophet, took occasion to exhort the people to the only method in which they could hope to avert his judgments, or be recovered from the fatal effects of them. Let them turn to him with fasting, and weeping for their sins; let them not be satisfied with the customary tokens of humiliation, such as rending their garments, &c.; for this would be vain, except their hearts were broken in self-abasement, and self-abhorrence, godly sorrow, unfeigned contrition, and resolute separation from their sins. To encourage them thus to turn to the Lord and his service, Joel reminded them that he was slow to anger, and of great kindness even to the most atrocious offenders; and ready to forgive their sins, and to put a stop to the progress of his judgments, when they humbled themselves before him. There could be no doubt of his forgiving every true penitent: and who knew whether he might not return to them as a nation, and avert the public calamities that were otherwise coming upon them? At least they might hope, that he would mitigate the severity of the judgment, and leave part of the fruits of the earth, as a blessing for them, after the locusts had finished their depredations; out of which they might present before him a meat-offering and a drink-offering; that he might not lose the honour, nor they the comfort and benefit, of their solemn worship. This tended to instruct them what part of the calamity ought most to afflict them.

heritage to reproach, [c] that the heathen should * rule over them: [d] wherefore should they say among the people, Where is their God?

18 Then will the LORD [e] be jealous for his land, [f] and pity his people.

19 Yea, the LORD will answer and say unto his people, Behold, [g] I will send you corn, and wine, and oil, [h] and ye shall be satisfied therewith: [i] and I will no more make you a reproach among the heathen:

20 But I will [k] remove far off from you [l] the northern army, and will drive him into a land barren and desolate, with his face toward [m] the east sea, and his hinder part toward the [n] utmost sea, and [o] his stink shall come up, and his ill savour shall come up, [p] because he hath † done great things.

V. 15—17. (Notes, i. 14. Ex. xix. 10—15.) The priests and rulers were again, and more particularly and earnestly, excited to announce the observance of a solemn fast, to be kept as a holy day to the LORD. Let them convene the congregation of Israel into the courts of the temple, and prepare the people by external purifications and proper instructions, for the profitable solemnizing of the day. Not only the elders and the grown people, but even the children and the sucking infants, must be present, as a part of the congregation. And that the consideration of the calamities in which they would be involved, might the more affect the minds of their parents: newly married persons, forgetful of the concerns and satisfactions peculiar to their situation, must be wholly engaged in the public humiliation and lamentation of their people. The priests, as the ministers of God, were to take the lead: and standing between the porch of the temple and the altar of burnt-offering, where they might most conveniently be seen and heard, they were required to weep for the sins and troubles of the nation, and to beseech the Lord to spare his people and heritage, though deserving of punishment; and not to let them be utterly ruined by famine, and thus left enfeebled and destitute, to be reproached, insulted, and enslaved by idolaters; who would blasphemously inquire, What was become of Israel's God and Protector? This has been considered as an intimation, that other calamities, besides that of the locusts, were intended in these predictions.

V. 18—20. Whenever the elders, priests, and people of Israel should thus turn unto the Lord, they would find him jealous for the honour of that land, where his temple stood and his name was worshipped, and ready to rescue it from famine and the oppressions of idolaters: and he would be compassionate to the miseries of his people, though brought upon them by their sins. They would then receive encouraging answers to their prayers, assuring them of an abundant supply of all their wants, and of every thing conducive to the enjoyment of life; nor would he again suffer the heathen to insult over them. He would also drive away the vast army of locusts, which from the north had invaded the land, into the deserts betwixt the southern extremity of the Dead sea and the Mediterranean sea, where they should die: and no effect of their ravages should remain, except the stench occasioned by the putrifying of so immense a quantity of insects; though they had done and threatened such immense mischief. 'Jerome 'relates, that in his own time, the heaps of locusts 'which were driven by the winds into the sea, afterwards 'putrified upon the shore, and so corrupted the air as to 'bring a pestilence.' (Lowth.) The locusts in Lan-'guedoc were about an inch in length, of a grey colour. 'The earth in some places was covered four inches thick 'with them, in the morning before the heat of the sun 'was considerable: but as soon as it began to grow hot, 'they took wing, and fell upon the corn, eating up both 'leaf and ear; and that with such expedition, by reason 'of their number, that in three hours they would devour 'a whole field. After which they again took wing, and 'their swarms were so thick, that they covered the sun 'like a cloud, and were whole hours in passing. After 'having eaten up the corn they fell upon the vines, the 'pulse, the willows, and even the hemp, notwithstanding 'its great bitterness. After this these insects died, and 'stunk very much.' (Philosophical Trans.)

V. 21—24. The land had been represented, by a bold figure, as mourning over its desolations, and the beasts as groaning, and even crying to the Lord, because of their sufferings, (i. 10. 18—20:) and here the promises of returning plenty and prosperity, are introduced by a poetical address to the land and to the cattle. (Marg. Ref.) —As the locusts had done great things in destroying the fruits of the earth, the Lord would do great things in rendering the fields and pastures abundantly fruitful. The cattle would speedily be supplied with plenty; for the pastures, in those parts of the country which were least populous and cultivated, began already to spring; and the fruit-trees were again covered with the several valuable productions: so that instead of sorrow and fear, the land and its inhabitants, and the beasts of the field, would exult for joy and gladness. 'As the cattle had their share in 'the dearth; so now they shall receive comfort in the 'return of plenty.' (Lowth.) "The children of Zion," however, ought not only to rejoice in the temporal abundance bestowed on them, but in the Lord their God; considering him as the Giver of all their comforts, and using them to his glory. The first month answered to the latter part of March and the former part of April; and the latter rain, at this season, served to fill the ear, and prepare the corn for the sickle. The barley-harvest seems to have begun generally in the first month; but the wheat-harvest was later. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25. The great abundance of the plentiful years should replenish the granaries and store-houses, which had been emptied in the years of famine.

My great army. 'We have here a key to the grand and 'beautiful description, which runs through these two 'chapters. Every reader of taste must be struck with 'the poetical and sublime manner in which the allegory is 'conducted. There is not a more splendid piece of poetry 'extant.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 26, 27. There can be no doubt concerning the primary meaning of this prophecy: but some expressions in these verses so accord to those used in respect of the deliverance of the Jews from captivity, their subsequent prosperity and security, and the prevalence of true religion among them, (Marg. Ref.) that it is not unreasonable to suppose, that the former part of the prophecy, couched under the primary meaning, a prediction of the desolations made by the Chaldeans; and the latter part, under the primary meaning, a prediction of the blessings in reserve for the nation, after their return from captivity, till the coming of Christ, and also after their conversion to him. (Notes, Ez. xxxiv. xxxvi. xxxvii. xxxix. 21—29.) 'My people shall not be disappointed of the trust 'they place in me; nor be reproached by the heathen, as 'if I had forsaken them.' (Lowth.)

V. 28—32. The apostle Peter quoted almost the whole of this passage, in addressing the Jews on the day of Pentecost, as a prediction of those events which then began to take place. It stands in the history (Acts ii. 16—21,) nearly according to the Septuagint; yet with some immaterial variations. The apostle also cites it, as predicting the conversion of the Gentiles, (Rom. x. 11—21.) After the events, before more expressly foretold, or "in the "latter days," the times of the Messiah, the LORD promised to "pour out his Spirit upon all flesh." 'Though 'the Jews only are enumerated, there is a latent reference 'to the effusion of the Spirit on the Gentiles also, in the 'times of the Gospel-dispensation.' (Bp. Newcombe.) This promise began to be accomplished on the day of Pentecost, when the Holy Spirit was poured out on the apostles, and on the assembled multitude, of whom great numbers were converted; and it was continued in the converting grace and supernatural gifts, conferred on the Jews and Gentiles through many nations. Then the sons and daughters of the Jews became prophets, and exercised many miraculous powers; both old and young men were favoured with prophetic dreams and visions; and even servants and hand-maidens, though in a state of slavery, were made partakers of the sanctifying grace and the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit. But it is predicted, that about that time God would begin to show signs of his awful displeasure against the Jewish nation; and that extraordinary appearances in the heavens and upon the earth, would be presages of the approaching destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish church and state; which would be attended with immense bloodshed, terrible conflagrations, and pillars of smoke, such as ascend from the flames of burning cities. Then would the sun, moon, and stars be darkened, or be turned into blood: this foretold either the tremendous appearances in the heavens which preceded these calamities; or the total unhinging of the Jewish constitution, the subversion of all rule and authority in church and state, and those horrid intestine convulsions and massacres, which made way for the final destruction of the city and temple; by the just judgment of God, who on that great and terrible day of vengeance poured his wrath on the devoted Jews by the hands of the Romans. But in the midst of all these calamities, there would be deliverance and salvation for all who should "call upon the name of the LORD." 'This St. Paul 'explains of those who give themselves up unto Christ, 'and profess themselves his disciples.' (Lowth.) 'Neither is there any way, or means to escape the terribleness 'of this judgment, but by believing in the Lord Christ, 'and calling upon his name. For in the Church of God 'only shall salvation be had, and deliverance from the 'wrath to come, which salvation shall lie open, both to 'the believers of the Gentiles, and to the remnant of 'those Jews whom the Lord shall call.' (Bp. Hall.)—It is evident, that what is here spoken of "calling on "the name of JEHOVAH," is repeatedly in the New Testament applied to "calling on the name of Christ." And it is remarkable, that those who embraced Christianity, and "honoured the Son even as they honoured the Fa-"ther," separated from the unbelieving Jews before the siege of Jerusalem, and were preserved from the miseries here predicted: while the unbelieving Jews, though they professed to "call on the name of the LORD," were overwhelmed by them: for "he that honoureth not the "Son, honoureth not the Father." He "that hath not "the Son, hath not the Father;" and the Supreme Being which is worshipped by those who refuse adoration to EMMANUEL, is not the true God, "The God of Abra-"ham," "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;" but an idol, the creature of vain man's reasonings and imaginations.

In the remnant, &c. This seems more immediately to point out the Jews who embraced Christianity in the primitive times: yet it may also include all, whether Jews or Gentiles, to the end of time, who shall be called to the fellowship of our Lord Jesus Christ. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

If the alarm of approaching temporal judgments should be given to offending nations and churches, that men may tremble, and seek to avert the impending storm, surely the ministers of the Gospel should be very earnest in warning sinners to seek deliverance from the wrath to come! The day of judgment with its decisive consequences will soon arrive: but what a day of darkness and gloominess will that be to the impenitent workers of wickedness! And how far will its terror exceed all that ever was experienced or imagined on earth! Yet those horrors will be but as the morning, or the entrance on, the subsequent endless state of misery and despair. Our business therefore here is to secure an interest in Jesus Christ, and his eternal salvation. The meanest executioners of the wrath of God can soon consume all our outward comforts, and turn an earthly paradise into a dreary wilderness. We can neither resist, flee away, nor shelter ourselves, when "the LORD mustereth his host for the battle." What then will be the case, when "the heavens and the "earth shall pass away with a great noise, the elements "shall melt with fervent heat, and the sun, and moon, and "stars shall for ever withdraw their shining?" Then "the Lord Jesus will be revealed in flaming fire, with his "mighty angels," to execute his threatened wrath; and who can abide that great and terrible day? All temporal calamities therefore should warn us to prepare for this final judgment.

V. 12—27.

So great is the mercy and grace of our God, that, instead of sternly saying to his rebellious subjects, "Depart "from me," he invites, yea, commands them to turn unto him. But this must be done with our whole heart, in unreserved and unfeigned repentance, faith, and obedience, with self-abhorrence, hatred of sin, godly sorrow and humiliation, and mortification even to lawful satisfactions, whilst engaged about so important a concern. But fasting, weeping, and mourning, and every outward indication of self-abasement, though highly proper, may yet be delusive and hypocritical: so that a broken and contrite heart is more pleasing to God, than rending garments, wearing sackcloth, and rolling in ashes; and the renunciation of sins that once were dear to us, is a better proof of repentance, than floods of tears, and most bitter wailings and lamentations. If we truly humble ourselves before God, we may also take encouragement from the assurance of his mercy and grace; "for he is slow to "anger, of great kindness, and ready to forgive." He will certainly save every believer from the final consequences of his transgressions; but it is not equally certain that he will prevent or remove the painful temporal consequences of them, or immediately speak peace to his conscience. Yet, who knoweth but he may thus return, and repent of the evil that was about to come upon us, and give us comfort when we forebode nothing but bitterness? —Whatever the Lord gives or withholds or takes away, we should still count it a blessing to have an opportunity of attending on his ordinances; and that portion of our substance, which is employed in his immediate service, will be the source of the greatest comfort. Those who are in authority should use their influence in calling people to observe seasons of public fasting, humiliation, and prayer for national blessings, in times of peril or calamity: ministers ought to instruct the people how they may observe such seasons in a holy manner: men of superior rank should sanction them by their attendance on sacred ordinances: no age, sex, or character, should be exempted: all private concerns should be postponed to the public duty: and when the ministers of God lead the service, with fervency and affection, and join weeping with their supplications, the people will be the more earnest in calling on the Lord to spare his heritage, that his enemies may not rejoice, as if he were not able or willing to protect his worshippers. Happy is that people who thus humbly and uprightly seek the Lord! he will be jealous for them and have compassion on them: he will plead their cause, avert his judgments, drive away their enemies, answer their prayers, and supply their wants; and the greatness of those things which have been done against them, shall only enhance their gratitude for the still greater things that the Lord will do for them. Indeed the sons of Zion can never have so great a cause to fear, but they must still have a greater "to rejoice "and be glad in the LORD their God:" he "gives grace "and glory, and no good thing will he withhold from "those that walk uprightly." He gives us all our comforts, and enables us to use them with thankful hearts: and "though he cause grief, yet he will have compassion "according to the multitude of his mercies." The wisdom, truth, and love of his dispensations towards us deserve our highest admiration: he makes us know by happy experience, that he dwelleth in the midst of us; and he will never leave his people to be ashamed of their confidence in him.

V. 28—32.

We have at present no scriptural ground to expect that he will pour upon us or our children the extraordinary gifts of his Spirit, or that they shall see prophetic dreams and visions: yet we may hope and pray for the pouring out of his Spirit on us and on ours, as the Author of all holiness, wisdom, and consolation. No age or description of persons is excluded from this expectation; and the gifts of our ascended Redeemer are sufficient to render the poorest slaves, wise, rich, and happy.—These sacred influences prepare the soul to meet the Lord: but the neglect or contempt of them shuts up the sinner under aggravated condemnation. The Gospel calls men in general to partake of these blessings, and of that salvation which is revealed and placed in the Church: and whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord Jesus, as the Son of God and the Saviour of sinners, shall be delivered from the wrath to come. This is the happy case of that remnant of every age and people whom the Lord calleth by his regenerating Spirit: all things shall work together for their good: they may look forward with comfort to the day when nature shall expire in convulsions, assured that then their eternal redemption shall be perfected. Let us therefore seek for and rejoice in this salvation; and let us still pray for the pouring out of the Spirit upon all flesh, in still greater abundance than in the primitive times, that the earth may be filled with truth and righteousness; encouraged by that fulfilment of these prophecies and promises, which hath beyond doubt already taken place.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1, 2. 'The following prophecy 'relates to the latter times of the world, when upon their 'conversion God shall deliver the Jews from their op- 'pressors, and restore them to their own land. Since all 'nations are summoned to answer the impeachment here 'mentioned, we may suppose the word Israel to compre- 'hend the faithful in all ages: and then we may observe 'that the judgments denounced against the Church's ene- 'mies, are chiefly for their hatred and cruelty against his 'servants.' (Lowth.) The restoration of the Jews, and the final decisive victory of true religion over all opposers, are the events more especially foretold. (Notes, Is. xxxiv. Ez. xxxviii. xxxix. Rev. xix.) It does not appear that these predictions at all referred to any of the judgments executed on the enemies of the Jews after the Babylonish captivity: but it is evident that they are not yet fully accomplished; and that they coincide with various other prophecies. (Marg. Ref.) The preceding chapter led us, in the series of prophecy, to the establishment of Christianity, the destruction of Jerusalem, and the dispersion of the unbelieving Jews. This was called "the captivity of "Judah and Jerusalem," from which God will bring them back by their conversion to Christ; and this event will be attended, or followed, by the more complete calling of the Gentiles into the Church. At that period the Lord will gather, in his providence, all the nations which continue at enmity with his people, that by warring against them they may bring destruction on themselves. The valley of Jehoshaphat may either mean the valley in which the Lord destroyed the numerous enemies of that prince; (2 Chr. xx:) or, alluding to the word Jehoshaphat, which signifies the LORD hath judged, it may refer to the judgment which God will denounce and execute on his enemies. Then and there he will plead the cause of his people, and avenge them upon those who had scattered them amongst the nations, and seized upon their land.

V. 3—8. These verses represent the indignities and cruelties, which have been exercised on the Jews and on the Church, in different ages; and which will at length be all brought into the account: and whilst one special time of retribution is predicted, terror is spoken to all those in every age, who are guilty of such crimes. The enemies of the Jews took them captives and enslaved them: yet they valued them so little, that they made them the stake in games of chance; nay, they used to sell a boy or girl into perpetual bondage, for the hire of a harlot, or for wine to make them drunk! But what right had any of the oppressors of the Jews, or of the Church, (of which Tyre, Zidon, and the Philistines are mentioned, because of their vicinity to Canaan,) thus to intrude upon the Lord's property? If they meant to retaliate on the Jews for the judgments, which God had executed by them on their progenitors; he was determined speedily to return their recompense upon their own heads. They plundered his people to enrich themselves, or the temples of their idols; and they sold them to be conveyed into far distant nations: but the Lord intended to restore them from their dispersed state, and avenge them on their oppressors, to give his worshippers the ascendency, and to enable them to reduce their foes to a state of similar debasement and misery. There are no events recorded in history, that entirely correspond with these predictions: perhaps the ruin of the Pagan Roman empire, which had destroyed Jerusalem and dispersed the Jews, might be adverted to; but the grand accomplishment seems to be yet in futurity, and the event alone can fully clear them up.

V. 9—17. This is a challenge publicly proclaimed to the enemies of the Jews and of the Church, to excite themselves and each other to a combined assault. Let not only such as had been trained up to arms, draw near; but let the husbandmen change their instruments of tillage into swords and spears; let the feeble and timid assume courage and affect strength; and let the heathen collect all their forces to battle against the worshippers of JEHOVAH. The mighty ones, whom the Lord was entreated to cause to come down, may either mean those potentates, that he would bring down as appointed to the slaughter; or those that he would employ as the executioners of his vengeance. Some explain it of angels, as ministers of his vengeance. His enemies would come down to battle, expecting victory and triumph; but He would bring them down as criminals to be judged, condemned, and executed. As their wickedness had been great, and they were ripe for judgment; the Lord would order his angels, or his people, to put in the sickle, to reap the harvest, and to gather and tread the vintage which would be very copious. Immense multitudes would be collected into the valley of decision or judgment, or threshing; where their cause would be decided and their doom pronounced, and executed in the approaching day of the Lord, which would be attended with most alarming prodigies. The Lord would roar against them out of Zion, as they were to be punished for their hatred to his cause, and their injuries to his people. Then the whole visible creation would be thrown into the most violent commotions, as if the final dissolution of all things were come; but in the midst of all these terrors, the Lord would enable his people to hope and rejoice in his mercy, truth, and powerful protection, and thus strengthen them against their fears and temptations. They should know and experience his gracious presence in his Church; and he would render her holy as well as secure; and preserve her from the injuries and intrusions of heathens, infidels, and such as were strangers to the power of godliness. (Note, 1, 2.) Nothing took place, in the interval between the captivity and the coming of Christ, either in respect of the nations that fought against the Jews, or the purity and peace of Jerusalem, at all answerable to this energetic language. Strangers, one after another, took Jerusalem, and even polluted the temple: and after the coming of Christ, the Romans destroyed both, and they have ever since been "trodden under foot of the Gentiles." But the Scriptures referred to in the margin, show that almost all the prophets foretel the same final victory of the Church over all the nations that oppose it; about the time when the Jews shall be converted, and restored to their own land, and just before the millennium, when "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our "Lord and of his Christ." The sublime description cannot but lead the reader to think of the end of the world, the day of judgment, and the heavenly Jerusalem: but events preceding the millennium are evidently predicted.

V. 18—21. At the time here foretold, a most abundant communication of divine influences will attend the administration of God's ordinances; there will be a rapid increase of converts, who will grow in grace, fruitfulness, and consolation in an extraordinary manner; and the Gospel will spread very speedily into the remotest corners of the earth. These events are predicted under significant emblems: it will be, as if the mountains should of themselves distil wine and milk in abundance; and every part of the land should be well watered, and exceedingly productive. That spiritual blessings are principally to be understood, appears from the prediction, "that a fountain should come forth of the house of the Lord, and "water the valley of Shittim," (Notes, Ezek. xlvii.) 'So 'the holy waters in Ezekiel are described, as running— 'as far as the Dead sea, the east part of which bordered 'on the country of Moab, within whose border was the 'valley of Shittim.' (Num. xxv. 1.) (Lowth.) 'In this 'verse, (18) either the times of the Messiah are described, 'or we have a description of Jerusalem, after its final 'restoration, when a golden age shall commence among 'its inhabitants, and when the knowledge of God and his 'Christ, shall a second time be widely diffused from it.' —Egypt, (19.) 'There shall be a signal difference between Egypt and Idumea, whose people shall be lost in 'the mass of other nations, and whose sovereignty shall 'not be restored; and Judah and Jerusalem, whose inhabitants shall be reinstated after their captivity; and on 'their future return, shall dwell for ever in their land, 'JEHOVAH displaying his glory among them.' (Bp. Newcombe.) 'The word blood, (21) may signify pollution in 'general. But the words chiefly import, that God will 'pardon the Jews the great crime of shedding the blood of 'Christ, upon their sincere repentance; the guilt of 'which they had imprecated on themselves and their posterity; (Matt. xxvii. 25;) and had felt the effects of 'God's displeasure on that account, for many ages.' (Lowth.) The spread of the Gospel and the progress of the work will be attended by the ruin of such nations and persons as shall persist in opposing them; on whom vengeance will be taken for all the violence and persecutions that they have committed. From this period the Church will continue in a state of peace and prosperity to the end of time: the Lord will then purify her from all the errors, abuses, and pollutions, which have hitherto defiled and deformed her. For he dwelleth in Zion, among his people, and will at length render his cause triumphant.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—3.

The appointed period of the troubles to which the Church and the believer are exposed, is frequently a day of vengeance on their enemies and persecutors: and all who have scattered, plundered, or injured the servants of God, will certainly be called to a severe account. Whilst men spend upon one vice what they gain by another, they rapidly treasure up wrath against the day of wrath, and show the atrociousness of their impiety and profligacy. Enmity to God and persecution of his people have generally been connected with the most degrading sensuality. But how wonderful is it, that men can sport with the miseries of their own species! can give a momentary worthless gratification, a decided preference to the most important interests of their neighbours, and can subject them to the extremity of hardship and anguish, without reluctance, from such vile motives! The Lord will review all these infamous transactions in due time: he will utterly disregard all the compensations, that oppressors would make for their crimes, by ostentatious liberality or hypocritical shows of piety; and their opposition to his will can avail nothing; but swiftly and suddenly will he return their recompense upon their own heads. He will make them refund their treasures, which they have gotten by sacrilege, persecution, oppression, and cruelty; or by selling his rational creatures, or his worshippers, for slaves as cattle, tearing them from their beloved relatives, and removing them far from their borders. They cannot be sure, but that they may fall into the hands of those whom they have thus cruelly injured: and perhaps their wrongs may be retaliated on them or their children; and their ill-gotten estates may descend with this encumbrance to their heirs.

V. 9—20.

Most dreadful, yet deserved punishment, will certainly be inflicted on all impenitent oppressors, and sinners of every description, when the Lord shall call the nations to his tribunal. As men ripen for his judgments, they are cut down like the harvest by the executioners of his vengeance: and the whole multitude will shortly be assembled to hear the righteous sentence denounced against them. He, who now reigns on a throne of grace, as a merciful Saviour, will then avenge himself on the despisers of his grace, and the opposers of his cause; and his wrath from mount Zion will be more tremendous, than that from mount Sinai. But amidst all the trials of life, in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment, the Lord will be the Hope and Confidence of his people, and the Support and Strength of the children of Israel. Various degrees of peace, prosperity, and purity have been, and will be, found in the Church on earth; and we should look forward in hope and with earnest prayers, for those glorious days, which are foretold: but in heaven alone will perfect holiness and felicity be enjoyed. No strangers will enter the Church triumphant, to defile those happy regions; no sin, temptation, or infirmity will then disturb our peace: for the Lord will fully cleanse every one of the blessed company previous to their admission; that he may manifest his presence and love with them for evermore. May we then be 'numbered with his saints in glory everlasting.'

BOOK OF AMOS.

'Though this prophet was of Tekoa, a city in the tribe of Judah; (2 Chr. x. 5, 6;)—yet he dwelt in Is-'rael, and prophesied chiefly against that kingdom. He was a shepherd, and herdsman, and a gatherer 'of sycamore-fruit, (vii. 14:) but rural employments were general and honourable among his countrymen. 'However, in the words, "I was no prophet, neither was I the son of a prophet," he seems to distin-'guish himself from those who were educated in the schools founded by Samuel. He borrows many 'images from the scenes in which he had been engaged; and gives them force and dignity, by the elo-'quence and grandeur of his manner. We shall find in him many affecting and pathetic, many elegant and 'sublime passages. No prophet hath more magnificently described the Deity; or more gravely rebuked 'the luxurious; or reproved injustice and oppression with greater warmth and a more generous indigna-'tion. An eminent judge and master of style, (Bp. Lowth,) pronounces him nearly equal to the very first 'prophets in elevation of sentiment and loftiness of spirit; and scarcely inferior to any in splendour of dic-'tion and beauty of composition' (Bp. Newcombe.)—Amos was cotemporary with Hosea: but it is supposed by the most competent judges, that he began to prophesy before him, and continued in his office a much shorter time. He has been confounded with Amoz, the father of Isaiah: but the names in the original are very different. He delivered prophecies against several of the neighbouring nations, and against Judah; but he exercised his ministry chiefly in Israel. In coincidence with the other prophets, he foretold the captivity and dispersion of the whole house of Israel; their preservation in this dispersed state, as a distinct people; the coming and kingdom of Christ; the conversion of the Gentiles, the final triumphs of the Church, and the future restoration of Israel: and that part of these predictions, which has been most wonderfully accomplished, is a sure pledge for the fulfilment of all the rest. Two of his prophecies are expressly quoted in the New Testament; (Com. v. 26, 27. with Acts vii. 42, 43. and ix. 11, 12. with Acts xv. 15—17;) in both of which his prophetical character is strongly attested.

NOTES.

CHAP. I., V. 1. There is no certainty in any of the conjectures that have been formed concerning this prophet; and we know nothing more of him, than what is intimated in his prophecy, (vii. 14, 15.) The former years of Uzziah coincided with the times of Jeroboam, the grandson of Jehu. (Note, Hosea i.) We find elsewhere, that a terrible earthquake happened during the reign of Uzziah, and it is recorded by Josephus, and is a general tradition among the Jews, that it took place, when Uzziah invaded the priestly office, and was smitten with a leprosy. Yet, as Jotham, who managed the affairs of the kingdom when Uzziah was smitten with leprosy, was not born when Jeroboam died; this opinion is worthy of little credit. The earthquake, however, seems to have been very tremendous; and it is mentioned as such by Zechariah several ages afterwards. When the prophet collected his predictions, he added this respecting the time when the first was delivered.

V. 2. (Marg. Ref.) Joel uses nearly the same expressions, as those with which Amos begins his prophecy. In Jerusalem and on mount Zion the Lord dwelt among his people, on a mercy-seat; but he would thence denounce and execute judgments, more terrible than the roaring of a lion, on his enemies, and especially on idolatrous and hypocritical Jews and Israelites. For by a drought he was about to desolate the countries, not so much as sparing the habitations of the shepherds, or leaving any verdure on the most fertile mountains and regions.

V. 3—5. The prophet first began with denouncing judgment against the several oppressors of his people. Damascus was the capital of Syria. Three and four, or seven transgressions, do not mean an exact number of offences, (Marg. Ref.) but intimate that in many things the persons spoken of had provoked the wrath of God, and were ripe for vengeance: and one offence is mentioned as more aggravated than the others, which was the immediate cause of their calamities. This, in the case of the Syrians, was their oppression of the inhabitants of Gilead beyond Jordan, whom they treated with as great cruelty, as if they had threshed them with threshing instruments of iron: or perhaps they actually tortured, in this inhuman manner, such of them as fell into their hands. (Marg. Ref.) 'This alludes to the threshing wain, described by 'Isaiah, (xli. 15.) It moved on serrated wheels, and at 'once forced out the grain, and cut the straw.' (Bp. Newcombe.) 'Hence the word is used for the weak 'being crushed by the mighty.' (Lowth.) Therefore, the wrath of God, as a consuming fire, would enter the house, or among the descendants, of Hazael king of Syria, and consume those palaces that Benhadad his predecessor had erected at Damascus, or those which his son Benhadad should inhabit. The Lord would also break down the bar of that city, open her gates to the besiegers, cut off the inhabitants of the open country, wrest the sceptre from the hands of the reigning family, and carry the people captive into Kir, in the land of Medea. This sentence seems to have been executed by the Assyrians. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6—8. Gaza, Ashdod, Ashkelon, and Ekron, were the principal cities of Philistia: probably Gath was at this time in the possession of the kings of Judah. The Philistines had added to their other crimes a recent instance of cruel revenge against the people of God. On some occasion, they had taken captive a multitude of Jews or Israelites, and had sold the whole company as slaves to the Edomites, who would be sure to treat them with the utmost rigour. The Lord would therefore no longer delay to punish them according to their deserts; but would destroy their cities, dethrone their princes, and extirpate the remnant of the nation. This was executed afterwards by the Assyrians, Jews, and Chaldeans.

V. 9, 10. The Tyrians had forgotten the brotherly covenant, that had subsisted between David and Solomon kings of Judah, and Hiram king of Tyre; and other treaties of amity, which had been entered into for their reciprocal advantage: and they had been guilty of great cruelty to the nation, after the example of the Philistines. This provoked God to send those judgments upon them, which were afterwards inflicted by Nebuchadnezzar and Alexander the Great. (Notes, Is. xxiii. Jer. xlvii. Ez. xxvi. xxviii.)

The judgment of God against Moab, for his barbarity, 1—3; on Judah, for his contempt of God's law, 4, 5; and on Israel, for idolatry, iniquity, and ingratitude, 6—16.

THUS saith the LORD; [a] For three transgressions [b] of Moab, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof; [c] because he burned the bones of the king of Edom into lime.

2 But I will send a fire upon Moab, and it shall devour the palaces of [d] Kirioth: and Moab shall die [e] with tumult, with shouting, and with the sound of the trumpet:

3 And I will [f] cut off the judge from the midst thereof, and will slay all the princes thereof with him, saith the LORD.

V. 11, 12. Edom, or Esau, was Jacob's brother; yet the Edomites were more cruel to the descendants of Jacob, than any of the strangers by whom they were surrounded! After the example of their progenitor, they pursued the Israelites with the sword: they readily purchased them for slaves from those that made them captives: they were void of compassion towards them, and full of furious revenge, which they vented in the most outrageous cruelties: but this would kindle the fire of God's wrath against their strongest cities, and reduce them to desolation. This was executed by the Assyrians and Chaldeans, and others, and finally by the Jews. (Notes, Is. xxxiv. lxiii. 1—6. Jer. xlix. 7—22. Ez. xxv. xxxv. Ob.)

V. 13—15. The Ammonites, to the east of Gilead, were as cruel to the inhabitants of that district, as the Assyrians to the north had been. Their enmity and avarice had induced them to be guilty of the most horrid barbarities, in order to extirpate the people, and to enlarge their border. This was about to bring down the vengeance of God on Rabbah, their capital city, which would be taken by storm, and destroyed suddenly as by a whirlwind; and this would be succeeded by the captivity of the king and his princes. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord hath often chosen the instruments of his work, in the sacred ministry and in important services, from inferior stations in society: and they need not be ashamed of their mean extraction or former low occupations, and should not be reproached on account of them, provided they faithfully discharge the duties to which they are called. The neglect of warnings from God frequently precedes the execution of his severe judgments: and whilst, from his throne of grace, he delighteth to exercise mercy to the humble believer, he will thence denounce and execute the severest vengeance on his enemies. He bears long with transgressors; but he will no longer turn away the punishment of those who have filled up the measure of their guilt. Cruelty to the helpless, and persecution of his people, ripen nations and individuals for destruction with great rapidity. His wrath consumes flourishing families and magnificent palaces, like a tremendous fire: it breaks down the gates of fortified cities, depopulates fertile regions, dethrones princes, and reduces potent nations to captivity and slavery. Thus oppressors are visited in rotation, according to the degree of their cruelty, treachery, violation of relative duties, or contempt of sacred treaties; or to that of their enmity and oppression. "They shall "have judgment without mercy, who have showed no "mercy," and such as cast off all pity for their brethren, and they whose wrath and revenge have raged perpetually against them, have no right to expect any mercy from God. Yet what cruelty will not men commit, to increase their estates! And what villany will not ambitious princes countenance, in order to enlarge their territories! But the day of retribution will come on such inhuman monsters, as an overwhelming tempest and an irresistible whirlwind: and what will they then do? or whither will they flee from the vengeance of God, and from the devouring fire of his incensed justice?

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. Because, &c. The Lord noticed this expression of impotent revenge of the Moabites, against the dead body of an idolatrous prince, and assigned it as a reason of the severe judgments that he was about to inflict on that people.

4 ¶ Thus saith the LORD; [z] For three transgressions of [h] Judah, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof; [i] because they have despised the law of the LORD, and have not kept his commandments, [k] and their lies caused them to err, [l] after the which their fathers have walked:

5 But [m] I will send a fire upon Judah, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem.

V. 4. The Jews were not indicted for any particular outrage, against the dictates of humanity or natural conscience; but for their contempt of the law and authority of God, who had committed to them his sacred oracles. Despising his worship, ordinances, and commandments, they hearkened to their false teachers, and worshipped idols, which were vanity and lies. 'Seeing the Gentiles —were thus punished, Judah, which was so far instructed in the Lord's will, might not think to escape.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6—8. After the prophet had given a general warning to the surrounding nations and to Judah; he more particularly, in the name of God, addressed the Israelites, to whom he was especially sent. They also had filled up, or were about to fill up, the measure of their sins, and the Lord would not avert from them the merited punishment. Several atrocious crimes were charged on them, some of which were sanctioned by the authority and example of the rulers. The smallest bribe, even the value of a pair of shoes, would induce the magistrates to give up a poor man to the will of his merciless oppressor, to be cast into prison, reduced to slavery, or put to death; though his cause and character were most evidently righteous; nay, perhaps for that very reason! The least property of a poor man, though scarcely more valuable than the dust of the earth that fell on his head, excited their covetousness, and they panted after it till they had got it from him: or, as some render the clause, "They tread down the heads of the "poor into the dust of the earth." Thus they perverted the cause of such as were too weak, timid, or gentle, to resist their oppressions. At the same time they were equally regardless of the divine law, and even of common decency, in their sensual indulgences; for both the father and his son would cohabit with the same woman, to the scandal of religion; when the Gentiles themselves would not allow a man to marry his father's wife. (Marg. Ref.) —Instead of restoring, according to the law, the garments of the poor, when taken as pledges, they made use of them, especially when they prostrated themselves before their idols; when they feasted, or slept, or committed abominations before their altars: and the wine, which they poured out as libations, or drank in their idolatrous feasts, was received as a bribe for the condemnation of innocent persons, or as a fine unjustly levied upon them! The word rendered "their god," may be translated "their gods." Either the golden calves, or other idols, are evidently meant.

V. 9—12. The peculiar favours, that the Lord had shown to Israel, aggravated the guilt of their iniquities and idolatries. He had destroyed before their fathers the gigantic Amorites, and the other formidable inhabitants of the land, on purpose to put them in possession of it. Not only were some individuals among these nations, of vast stature and strength, but the whole collective body of them resembled a deep rooted and strong oak, which the Lord, for Israel's benefit destroyed, root, branch, and fruit, together. This was only the continuation of his former favours to that nation, in delivering them from the Egyptians, and preserving them in the wilderness. He had also greatly honoured them; and provided for their spiritual good, in raising up prophets from among their sons, to instruct them in his service: and he had continued this favour to the kingdom of the ten tribes, even after their revolt from the family of David, and separation from the temple and worship at Jerusalem. He had likewise raised up among their young men, Nazarites, to be examples of self-denial and devotedness to God. But, instead of profiting by these undeniable and extraordinary benefits, they tempted the Nazarites to break their vows; and by authority, threatenings, and persecution, endeavoured to silence the prophets. (Marg. Ref.) 'They would not endure 'that their idolatry and other darling sins should be re-'proved.' (Lowth.)

V. 13. Israel was become, as it were, an intolerable burden to the Lord: they so dishonoured and provoked him, that he was weary of them, and was pressed down by their obstinate provocations, like a cart when heavy laden with sheaves of corn. 'Therefore I will press your 'place, as a loaded corn-wain presseth the sheaves.' (Bp. Newcombe.) (Is. xxviii. 27.) Provoked by their crimes, he would entirely destroy their cities and habitations. (Marg.) The illustration, according to either rendering, is taken from the scenes in which the prophet had been conversant.

V. 14—16. "For the flight, &c." Neither agility, vigour, numbers, contrivances, nor valour, would deliver the people from the judgments which were coming upon them: few would escape, and those few would be destitute fugitives in other countries, or naked captives in the hands of their enemies. The desolations occasioned by the earthquake before-mentioned (i. 1.) may perhaps be here referred to; but the destruction of Samaria, and the captivity of Israel by the Assyrians, must principally be intended.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In what varied and horrid forms do the malignant passions of the human heart break forth, on different occasions! But the Lord keeps an exact account of the conduct of ungodly men even towards each other; and he will punish every expression of a vindictive and cruel disposition, towards the living or the dead. They who insult over the fallen or the miserable, may expect to be insulted over, perhaps when in extreme agony; and to die "with "tumult and shouting and with the sound of a trumpet;" and judges and princes, when ringleaders in wickedness, may have the pre-eminence of more aggravated misery than their subjects. But it is a small thing for those, "to "whom are committed the oracles of God," to avoid the gross enormities of benighted heathens; without such crimes, they may fill up a large measure of guilt, and ripen apace for vengeance, "by despising the law of the LORD, "and not keeping his commandments;" and by preferring their own imaginations or inclinations to his holy truths, ordinances, and precepts. False doctrines, delusive superstitions, idolatries, and atrocious violations of God's word, have often been perpetuated by tradition in the visible church; and one generation after another has "erred "through the lies, after which their fathers have walked;" till the wrath of God have burned like fire, to consume even the palaces of Jerusalem. When known crimes are deliberately ventured upon for worldly gain, men will by degrees perpetrate the basest villanies for the lowest recompense, and will become callous to all the miseries of the poor: nay, they will take pleasure in trampling on the righteous and the meek, out of contempt and enmity to their characters! Such nominal Christians will grudge the poor servant, labourer, and mechanic the smallest advantage or indulgence, and eagerly pursue every iniquitous method of extorting their little from them, to increase their own abundance. Injustice and rapacity are generally accompanied with sensuality and licentiousness, and lead to impiety, infidelity, or abominable idolatry. But no wrongs will be so fatal to the injurer, as those that are done to the poor and meek, who cannot, or will not, avenge themselves. —When the obligations are considered, which professed Christians have received from God in his providence; and by his word, ministers, and ordinances, and the good examples set before them; it must be evident, that their crimes are far more aggravated than similar practices of ignorant Pagans. But they, who hate self-denial and piety themselves, will commonly attempt to seduce such as profess them, either to renounce or disgrace their profession: too many, that seemed to run well, have thus been led into those "worldly lusts which war against the soul;" and as "every one that doeth evil, hateth the light," we need not wonder at the pains which wicked men take to silence, intimidate, or corrupt the ministers of God. Thus they add obstinacy to iniquity, and do the work of Satan, as well as that of the fallen children of Adam. When this becomes the general character of churches or nations, it cannot be expected that the Lord will any longer endure them; but they will be given up to complicated misery, notwithstanding all their idolized power, courage or resources: nor can individuals, who profess, and thus disgrace, the Gospel, escape the future wrath of an offended God.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—3. This chapter begins another message from God, which was addressed to all the posterity of Jacob. This whole family, which the Lord had brought out of Egypt, had been owned, noticed, and favoured by him, in such a manner as no other people had been; especially in having his oracles and ordinances amongst them, and being admitted into a covenant-relation to him as his worshippers. But instead of being, on that account, connived at in their wickedness, his honour required that they should be punished with distinguished severity. They could not reasonably expect to continue in friendship and peace with God, and under his protection, whilst their conduct was directly contrary to his holy law. Without coincidence in judgment, inclinations, and pursuits, men cannot be intimately united in friendship, or live together in harmony and comfort. They, therefore, who do not count the Lord worthy of all love, honour, worship, and obedience, do not love his law, regard not his service as liberty and felicity, dislike his way of saving sinners, and seek not his glory, cannot walk together with him in his ordinances, commandments, and providence. Notions, forms, sects, or outward conduct, cannot supply the want of conformity to God, which must be derived from the regenerating grace of the Holy Spirit. (Note, Gen. v. 22—24.) "Can two go together, except they 'meet by appointment?" 'As a journey, in which two 'engage, supposes a settled meeting; so the denouncing 'of God's designs by his prophets shows that he has made 'himself known to them.' (Bp. Newcombe.) Others seem to put the same construction on this verse; and the context rather favours it. Yet it does not appear how the prophet's mission could thus be proved, till his predictions were accomplished: and certainly the instruction, on the preceding interpretation, is very important, and accords with the plain meaning of the words, and the general tenour of Scripture.

V. 4—8. These animated interrogations were intended to convince the people that they had cause for alarm, and should earnestly seek to avert the threatened wrath of God. The lion in the forest, and the young lion in the den, are observed to roar over their prey, or are urged by hunger for want of it, when they have it in view, or are devouring it, and not at other times: in like manner the Lord would not have "roared out of Zion," had he not marked out the idolatrous Israelites as the objects of his righteous indignation, which was about to seize upon them with irresistible force. Birds are not caught in a snare by chance; but it is laid for them, and generally not taken up, till some of them be ensnared: so the calamities, which befel the people, were the effect of the Lord's purpose of punishing them for their sins; and would not be removed, till they had effected their reformation or their ruin. The trumpet announcing the approach of the enemy would excite the people to run together, and concert measures for their security: and ought not Israel to take the alarm, at the terrifying messages delivered to them in the name of God? They would not surely ascribe their troubles to any other cause; for was there any evil or calamity in a city that was not from him, and the effect of his wrath? Indeed he would do nothing, (especially respecting Israel,) without revealing his secret purpose to his servants the prophets; who, being thus informed of what was about to come to pass, must declare it to the people, that they might take warning and act accordingly. Nor could they do otherwise; for who could help trembling at the roaring of a lion? And who could help prophesying, when the Lord GOD spake to him of the judgments which he was about to execute upon transgressors? The people ought not therefore to blame the prophets for their awful predictions; but to approve their conduct, and to take warning to repent and return to God, if so be his wrath might be averted or deferred. The grand outlines of the plan of divine providence, and the events of history, to this day and to the end of the world, were made known to the prophets of Israel and Judah; and a vast proportion of them many ages before they took place: so that a general history of mankind, as to the most important facts, might be composed from their writings. Yet, these prophets excepted, no nation has had fewer good authors, no nation has been more generally unnoticed or despised.

CHAP. IV.

The prosperous Israelites are reproved and threatened for oppression and idolatry,

---

V. 9—15. The heathen neighbours of Israel, and those who had most oppressed and annoyed them, were summoned to assemble at Samaria, that they might behold their crimes and punishment. There they would behold a city full of tumults, occasioned by vice, injustice, and oppression; to which they were so habituated, that they knew not how to act honestly or conscientiously; but were continually storing up the gains of violence and robbery, even in the palaces of their kings and nobles. For these crimes the Lord, in vindication of his own honour, would send the Assyrians to invade the land, and besiege the city, and level it with the ground. The inhabitants would then be so massacred, that only a few obscure persons would escape. As with great difficulty and danger the shepherd recovers some small remains of the sheep, that a lion hath devoured, which shows what is become of those that are missing; so a few individuals, who had hid themselves under their beds, or wrapped themselves up in some fragment of its covering, to escape the sword of the conquerors, would at length be brought forth, to be carried away captive. Or some who had fled to Damascus, being pursued thither by the common enemy of Israel and Syria, would thus be with difficulty preserved from slaughter in their beds. For the prophet was to testify to the family of Jacob, that when the Lord should arise to punish their transgressions, he would be sure to destroy the altars of Bethel, and avenge on them that base idolatry: and that the winter-houses and summer-houses, which the great men had for luxury, as well as all their decorated and magnificent palaces, would be entirely destroyed by their enemies. Benhadad agreed that Ahab should build streets in Damascus: (1 Kings xx. 34:) and probably many Israelites dwelt there. 'This prophe-'cy may have been delivered, when Jeroboam the second 'was in possession of Damascus.' (2 Kings xiv. 28.) (Bp. Newcombe.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is lamentable to consider how often peculiar advantages only serve to increase the guilt and punishment of their possessors: we should therefore take heed not to presume on external privileges, without special sanctifying grace. The proud, the sensual, the covetous, the unmerciful and deceitful, cannot enjoy communion with a holy God: he can have no pleasure in them, nor they in him. And as all our happiness must arise from his love and from walking with him, we should be the more earnest in seeking conformity to his image, as connected with reconciliation to him through Jesus Christ. Let none suppose that the threatenings of God's word were intended merely to frighten them, or that he hath no ground for the severity which is denounced, or that he does not intend to execute it. Impenitent sinners are the prey against which he utters his tremendous voice, and not one of them will escape his righteous vengeance. Their present troubles spring from his anger, and will either end in their repentance or destruction. Surely then, sinners should take warning, and escape for their lives: and we all ought to "submit to "God's righteousness," in the evil that he inflicts upon us for our sins. His secret is with them that fear him; and he hath made known the rules of his dealings with us by his holy prophets: nay, his faithful ministers, though not acquainted with his secret counsels by immediate revelation, may see most evidently that judgments are about to be executed on the wicked; and they cannot but speak, that men may fear and flee from impending destruction.—Even idolaters will at length be called upon to witness and to approve God's judgments upon apostates and hypocrites. The tumults of prosperous wickedness, sensuality, and oppression, which blind the understanding, and harden the heart to every sentiment or feeling of justice or mercy, tend to tumults of a still more terrible nature, and provoke the most ruinous judgments of God against nations and individuals. Indeed, "a remnant according "to the election of grace" will be secured by our great and good Shepherd, as from the jaws of destruction, in the worst of times; but generally they consist of the poor, obscure, and neglected; whilst the rich oppressors, who store up robbery in their palaces, the delicate, the luxurious, and magnificent, are marked out for judgment; and their hypocritical or idolatrous forms of worship serve only to increase their condemnation.

1—5. Their incorrigibleness under previous visitations, 6—11. They are warned to prepare to meet God, who was about to execute vengeance upon them, 12, 13.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. The cattle of Bashan were remarkable for their size, fatness, and wantonness; and the wealthy, luxurious, and profligate rulers and nobles of Samaria seem to have been intended, though some interpret it of the haughty matrons. But the princes might be described as kine, rather than bulls, to reprove their effeminacy and cowardice when assaulted by their enemies; whilst they crushed and trampled upon their unresisting brethren, and sold them for slaves; saying to the masters, who bought them, "Bring us wine that we may drink." Having made the iniquitous bargain, perhaps on low terms, they required from the purchaser, in this slave-trade, to be treated with wine. But the Lord had sworn by his own holiness, that they and their posterity, should be dragged out of their habitations, as helpless fishes are drawn by the hook out of the water to be destroyed. The wall of Samaria would be broken down by the besiegers; then every one of these oppressors would endeavour to escape by that breach which was nearest to his station: they would cast away the treasures which they had hoarded in their palaces; or they would throw them down there, that they might be the more unencumbered in fleeing from the enemy; and yet they would not be able to escape.

V. 4, 5. This is an ironical or sarcastical address to the idolatrous Israelites. Let them go to Beth-el, or Gilgal, and multiply transgressions: let them offer daily oblations to their idols, and employ in their service the second tithes, which every third year ought to have been consumed in religious feasting with their priests, Levites, and poor brethren, (Note, Deut. xiv. 22—29:) and let them openly present their peace-offerings and free will-offerings to their golden calves, proclaiming the sacrifices and inviting guests, in imitation of the worship paid to God at Jerusalem. For this conduct would be agreeable to their inclinations, and consistent with their character. (Marg. Ref.) "Burn a thank-offering of leaven;" 'in 'contempt of the law.' (Note, Lev. vii. 11—16.) (Bp. Newcombe.) 'Your hearts are so set upon your idolatrous 'worship, that it is in vain to use any arguments to per-'suade you to the contrary.' (Lowth.) 'He speaketh 'this in contempt of them who resorted to these places; 'thinking that great devotion and good intention, had 'been sufficient to have bound God unto them.'

V. 6. "Cleanness of teeth" signifies, want of food.

V. 7. Rain. 'This was called the latter rain, and the 'season for it was the first month, which was three months 'before the wheat-harvest.'

—One city, &c. 'This may import, that God punished 'Israel with drought, at the same time when he sent rain 'upon the cities of Judah; making that remarkable dif-'ference between Israel and Judah, which he did formerly 'between Egypt and Goshen.' (Lowth.) It is probable, that in Israel those cities which had been most free from idolatry were most exempt from the drought.

V. 9. (Notes, Joel i, ii.) These visitations were suited to convince the Israelites of their sin and folly, and to bring them to "repent and turn to God, and do works meet for "repentance:" but not having this effect, they eventually hastened the ruin of the nation.

10 I have sent among you the [e] pestilence * after the manner of Egypt: [f] your young men have I slain with the sword, † and have taken away your horses; and I have made [g] the stink of your camps to come up unto your nostrils: [h] yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the LORD.

11 I have overthrown some of you, [i] as God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah, and ye were [k] as a fire-brand plucked out of the burning: [l] yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the LORD.

12 Therefore [m] thus will I do unto thee, O Israel: and because I will do this unto thee, [n] prepare to meet thy God, O Israel.

13 For, lo, [o] he that formeth the mountains, [p] and createth the ‡ wind, [q] and declareth unto man what is his thought, [r] that maketh the morning darkness, [s] and treadeth upon the high places of the earth, [t] The LORD, the God of hosts, is his name.

V. 10. In consequence of famine, drought, and locusts, dreadful pestilences prevailed in the land; like those with which God had visited the Egyptians, especially when the first-born were destroyed: and in this enfeebled state the people were harassed by the incursions of the Assyrians and other enemies, who slew their chosen young men, and seized on those horses, which at great expense, had been procured from Egypt for their cavalry. Being thus obliged to keep their armies encamped, when pestilence raged, and many were slaughtered, and perhaps left unburied through the distress of the survivors, their camps became exceedingly offensive, and increased the dire calamity.

V. 11. (Marg. Ref.) Perhaps this judgment was the effect of the earthquake, before mentioned, (i. 1.) 'You 'were almost all consumed, and a few of you wonderfully 'preserved.'

V. 12, 13. As the Israelites persisted in rebellion and idolatry, notwithstanding these warnings, judgments, and respites, the Lord was determined to do thus unto them: that is, to bring upon them the calamities that had before been predicted. (iii. 14, 15.) He warned them therefore to prepare to meet him as their offended Judge and Adversary, who was about to denounce sentence, and to execute righteous vengeance upon them by the Assyrian armies. They would then have to contend with the Creator of the mountains; the sovereign Disposer of winds and storms; the heart-searching omniscient Judge, who showeth to every man even his secret thoughts; the Arbiter of every man's prosperity or adversity, who turneth the morning of hopeful success into the darkness of misery and despair; and the omnipotent Lord, who is able to tread down the stoutest of the great ones of the earth, and to put all enemies under his feet. He was coming against Israel as an adversary; but if any desired to escape his vengeance, it behooved them to submit, and humble themselves before him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The luxurious and cruel oppressors of the poor are often as destitute of manly courage as of compassion; and their wanton tyranny over their helpless inferiors is attended with as abject a servility towards their powerful opposers. —Careless and prosperous sinners will soon be entangled in their own devices, or by the judgments of God, as in a net; and they will be disappointed in all their efforts to escape deserved vengeance. How miserable are they whose religion, the result of their corrupt reasonings and inclinations, serves only to multiply their transgressions! whose diligence, expense, and superstitious devotion, ripen them for destruction; and whose confidence, and self-satisfaction in antiscriptural observances, prove that they are given over to a strong delusion to believe a lie! Let us then compare our sentiments, conduct, and worship, with the standard of holy Scripture; and pray continually to be guided into the way of peace. What diversified miseries hath sin exposed us to, even in this world! But let us remember, that this is a state of probation and discipline, and that afflictions are employed as rebukes, corrections, and warnings, and should be thus received. For they tend to show the evil of sin, the power of divine wrath, the vanity of this world, the danger of continuing impenitent, and our need of the mercy, grace, and comfort of the Gospel. But when famine and pinching hunger and thirst, when impoverishing dispensations, when wasting pestilences and wars, when earthquakes and conflagrations, when urgent distresses, affecting examples in the case of others, and marvellous escapes in their own, do not lead men "to repent and turn to God, and to do "works meet for repentance," they evince the hardness, depravity, and enmity of their hearts, and so display the justice of God in their final condemnation. Ere long we must meet our God in judgment: but we shall never be able to stand before him, if he be severe in marking our iniquities: we cannot deny or excuse our crimes; we cannot withstand, escape, or endure his righteous vengeance: for what can a poor worm do, who hath to contend with the omnipotent, omniscient, and everlasting Creator and Sovereign of the universe? If we would prepare to meet our God with comfort at that awful period, we must now meet him in Christ Jesus, the eternal Son of the Father, who came down from heaven, to bleed and die in our nature, to save lost sinners: we must meet him upon a mercy-seat, by faith and prayer: we must "seek him "whilst he may be found, and call upon him whilst he is "near;" that so his "saving grace may teach and enable "us to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live "soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world:" and then "we shall have confidence, and not be ashamed "before him at his coming."

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—3. 'The prophet bemoans the 'state of Israel, as dead and irrecoverably lost.' 'Those 'cities or kingdoms, which never were conquered, are 'called Virgins.' "She is forsaken," 'like an infant 'that is exposed, or fallen on the ground, and hath none 'to take it up.' (Lowth.) God would forsake the people; and there would be none able to raise them from their ruined condition, or to prevent their being carried away into captivity by the Assyrians. They would soon be so diminished and enfeebled by intestine convulsions and foreign invasions, that their cities would not be able to furnish more than a tenth part of their former number of soldiers; and so they would be utterly unable to resist the power of the Assyrian invaders.

V. 4—6. Notwithstanding all these denunciations, the Israelites would have nothing to blame for their ruin, except their own obstinacy in rebellion. Still the Lord assured them, that if they would seek him, they should live, and be preserved from their enemies; that is, if they sought his favour and protection, by repentance, faith and prayer, and by returning to his worship and service. And any individuals, who thus sought him, would save their souls alive, and might perhaps be rescued from the general ruin of the nation. But they must not imagine, that going to worship the calves at Beth-el, or Gilgal, or Beer-sheba, (which probably was in the hands of the kings of Israel at that time,) would avail them any thing. All the worship and sacrifices presented in those places were an abomination: and they must protest against them, and seek the Lord according to his word. For Beth-el and Gilgal, and their inhabitants, idols, priests, and worshippers, would fall into the hands of their enemies; and none of them would be able to avert or to quench the fire of God's indignation, which was about to devour the house of Joseph, or the kingdom of Israel, of which Ephraim and Manasseh formed a principal part. "Beth-el shall become "Aven," or vanity. The house of God was become the house of idols, and would soon be utterly ruined. 'The 'idol you worship will not be able to deliver you, but will 'itself be involved in the common calamity.' (Lowth.)

V. 7—9. The rulers of Israel were here particularly addressed: their iniquity rendered their judicial proceedings a source of oppression and misery; and they had left off all regard to justice, as well as to religion, throughout the land. Thus they provoked that glorious God, whose favour they should have sought: even Him who had created the stars in their constellations, which were supposed to have a great influence on the seasons, for rain or drought, for plenty or scarcity. For he could as easily raise men from the depth of misery to felicity, or cast them down from the summit of prosperity into distress and despair, as he changes the darkness of the night into the light of the morning, or the brightness of the day into the gloom of the evening. He could again pour the waters of the ocean upon the earth, and cause a second deluge, if he saw good; for he is the eternal, self-existent, and all-sufficient JEHOVAH. He could even give strength to a few plundered and dispirited captives, to vanquish the mightiest conquerors, or to take the most strongly fortified cities. What then had his enemies to expect, but inevitable destruction?

11 Forasmuch therefore as your [f]treading is upon the poor, and ye take from him burdens of wheat: [g] ye have built houses of hewn stone, but ye shall not dwell in them; ye have planted * pleasant vineyards, but ye shall not drink wine of them.

12 For [h] I know your [i] manifold transgressions and your mighty sins: [k] they afflict the just, they [l] take a † bribe, [m] and they turn aside the poor [n] in the gate from their right.

13 Therefore [o] the prudent shall keep silence in that time; for it is [p] an evil time.

14 [q] Seek good, and not evil, that ye may live; [r] and so the LORD, the God of hosts, shall be with you, [s] as ye have spoken.

15 [t] Hate the evil, and love the good, and [u] establish judgment in the gate: [x] it may be that the LORD God of hosts will be gracious unto [y] the remnant of Joseph.

16 Therefore [z] the LORD, the God of hosts, the LORD saith thus; [a] Wailing shall be in all streets; and they shall say in all the highways, Alas! alas! and they shall call the husbandman to mourning, and such as are skilful of lamentation to wailing.

17 And [b] in all vineyards shall be wailing: for [c] I will pass through thee, saith the LORD.

18 Woe unto you that [d] desire the day of the LORD! to what end is it for you? [e] the day of the LORD is darkness, and not light.

19 As [f] if a man did flee from a lion, and a bear met him: or went into the house, and leaned his hand on the wall, and a serpent bit him.

20 Shall not the day of the LORD be [g] darkness and not light? even very dark, and no brightness in it?

V. 10—13. The atheistical and iniquitous rulers of Israel would not regard the prophet's exhortations; he therefore next spake to others concerning them. They hated the prophets, who rebuked the wickedness of the people in the most public parts of the city, without sparing the corrupt magistrates that perverted justice in their courts: nay, they abhorred every one that spake uprightly, whether as an honest witness that came before them, or a magistrate who objected to their perversion of equity. They would not be reproved, because they hated to be reformed. They continually trampled down the poor, and robbed them of the burdens of wheat, which they had gleaned, bought, or earned, for the support of their families; and left them to starve, whilst they were framing splendid palaces and pleasant vineyards for themselves. But the Lord would not suffer them to enjoy their ill-gotten estates; he knew their manifold and atrocious crimes, their impiety, bribery, and extortion, and would take vengeance on them. But the times were so perilous and iniquitous, that prudent persons, except evidently called to it, would choose to keep silence, even from complaining, lest they should excite the indignation of their cruel oppressors.

V. 14, 15. The prophet did not think that it behooved him to be silent; he still exhorted the people to "seek "good, and not evil." Instead of having recourse to their idols, or indulging their passions, they should seek the good knowledge, salvation, and ways of the Lord. Then indeed they might hope for the gracious presence of God with them, which they now presumptuously expected, because of their external relation to him. But they could not heartily shun the evil and seek the good, except they hated the one and loved the other; so that a change of their inward disposition was as requisite, as a reformation of their outward conduct. (Marg. Ref.) This would lead them to establish judgment in the gate, by righteous laws and decisions; and then perhaps the Lord might be gracious to the enfeebled remnant of the nation, and recover it to its former prosperity. This probably, was written between the first ravages of the Assyrians, and their more complete success.

V. 16, 17. As the Lord foreknew that these exhortations would be generally disregarded, he assured the people that the approaching calamities would fill the streets of the cities, the high-ways, and the pleasant vineyards, the usual scenes of joy and festivity, with bitter lamentations: whilst the husbandmen, driven from their work, would join the skilful hireling mourners in bewailing the public calamities. For the Lord was about to pass through the land, as he had done through Egypt, when he destroyed the first-born. 'Those whose trade and prac-'tice is to make common lamentation, shall now mourn in 'earnest without hire.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 18—20. The prophet had mentioned the day of the LORD, and some of the people expressed a desire of its arrival; either scornfully deriding his message, or presumptuously expecting the interposition of God in their favour. But their scorn or presumption would ensure wo to them; the day of the LORD would be to them a season of the utmost distress and despondency, without any mixture of joy and prosperity. One calamity would succeed to another: so that they that escaped the first would be destroyed by the second, or third: as if a man, having fled from a lion, should be met by a bear; or having got into a house fatigued and alarmed, and leaning against a wall to recover himself, should there be stung to death by a serpent.

V. 21—24. (Note, Is. i. 10—18.) The Israelites were encouraged in presumption, by the observance of religious solemnities. Perhaps, in the temples belonging to the ten tribes, they copied the manner of keeping the solemn feasts, of presenting the sacrifices, and even the music and psalmody, in use at the temple of Jerusalem. But the whole was so corrupted with idolatry, superstition, hypocrisy, and iniquity, that God utterly abhorred and rejected it. Some, however, think that Judah also was included in this rebuke, and on very probable grounds.—Instead of relying on these external and hypocritical services, they would do better to reform the courts of justice; that judgment and equity might thence be diffused, like streams of waters, throughout the land. Thus a hopeful beginning might be made, of reformation in morals and religion, without which no sacrifices could please God.—'Let justice have its free course, so that the meanest per-'sons may have the benefit of it.' (Lowth.)

V. 25—27. The generation of Israel, to whom the prophet spake, only copied the crimes of their forefathers, even from the time of their leaving Egypt. For almost forty years, during their continuance in the wilderness, the prescribed sacrifices to the Lord were greatly neglected or interrupted; and yet with great toil and expense, they carried along with them shrines or models of the tabernacles in which their idols had been worshipped, with images in them, as learned men suppose. Moloch is a name familiar to the student of Scripture, but nothing satisfactory can be known of Chiun, or the star of their god; perhaps some of the planets or constellations were worshipped under this name, and the image of it might be decorated or distinguished by the figure of a star. (Acts vii. 42, 43.) Some remains of this idolatry, probably, existed in the time of Amos. 'Hazael carried away many 'Israelites captives to Damascus: but the king of Assyria 'carried the ten tribes captives as far as Media, at a 'much greater distance than Babylon. (Acts vii. 43.)—'The captivity of the ten tribes would be far worse 'than that of the two remaining, and with less hopes of 'returning to their own country.' (Lowth.) Though the ten tribes might be especially addressed, it is plain, that all the descendants of those Israelites who came out of Egypt, were concerned in the expostulation and the prediction.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

Pious minds will often be constrained to lament over the corruptions and calamities of the visible Church: for if professors of religion provoke God to forsake them, they have none to raise them up from their fallen state. But the true Church, though often distressed and apparently diminished, still maintains its ground, and will again be replenished. Whilst the Judge standeth even at the door, ready to execute vengeance on evil-doers, he still proclaims, mercy to those who will accept of it in his way: but men often expect deliverance, by such idolatrous superstitious forms as only ensure condemnation: and whilst they refuse to seek the Lord, and to come to him by Jesus Christ, that they may live; the fire of divine indignation breaks forth upon them, and none of their devices or teachers can quench it. No man can reasonably disregard the wrath or favour of that God, who orders all things in heaven and earth as he pleases. He destroys countries by drought or fire, by deluges or hostile invaders, in an irresistible manner. He can envelope men in natural or spiritual darkness, or involve them in terror and despair; or he can give light, joy, and prosperity, as he sees good: and whilst oppressors "turn judgment into wormwood, and leave off "righteousness in the earth;" they forget that the LORD can "strengthen the spoiled against the strong," and execute vengeance on them by the hands of the poor outcasts whom they despise. But hardened oppressors can seldom be induced to fear the wrath or seek the favour of God: they hate the light; and faithful preachers, who speak not good of them, but evil, and rebuke their crimes as openly as they commit them. Intent on enriching and indulging themselves, they trample on the poor, and iniquitously, as well as unmercifully, deprive them of their hard-earned pittance, that themselves may riot in sensuality and magnificence. But the Lord noticeth all their "afflicting of "the just," and all their bribery, peculation, and perversion of law and equity; and he will soon terminate their prosperity and oppression together. It is, however, generally prudent for men to keep silence in such evil times, and to leave the matter with the Lord; lest improper intermeddling should render a bad condition still worse.

ture or suffer: they must continue to call on men to "seek "the good and not the evil, that the Lord God of hosts "may be with them:" and as we must learn "to hate "the evil and love the good," if we would acceptably serve God on earth, or be fit for heaven, it behooves us earnestly to plead his promises, and to beseech him to "create in us a clean heart, and to renew a right spirit "within us;" and then all piety and righteousness, and every relative duty, will readily and constantly be attended on. The Lord is ever ready to be gracious to the souls that seek him; and we may hope for his returning favour to the remnant of diminished churches, when they seek him in humility and sincerity. But mourning and lamentation must come on all who neglect him, even in those places where joy and gladness did most abound: and it is a vain presumption for the impenitent and unbelieving to hope for favour in the day of the Lord, which will be to them "darkness and not light, even very dark and no brightness "in it:" for though ungodly men may escape the most complicated temporal judgments, none of them can avoid everlasting destruction. God abhors even the most pompous services of the proud, impenitent, and hypocritical; and is offended at their very songs of praise. But it is grievous to reflect how his word has been disregarded, even by his worshippers, in every age of the Church; and how much more labour, expense, and self-denial, have been exercised by idolaters and the devotees of superstition, than have been observable among those who professed to adhere to the scriptural and spiritual worship of our God.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1. The wealthy and haughty inhabitants, both of Jerusalem and Samaria, seem to be here addressed. They confided in their fortifications and external advantages, carelessly indulged themselves, and were heedless about consequences, though destruction impended over them. Some, however, understand the passage differently. 'The word rendered are at ease, signifies 'also to be insolent; in which sense the words may fitly 'belong to the ten tribes, who despised Zion and the 'temple, "which God chose out of all the tribes of Israel, "to place his name there." 'Zion, or Jerusalem, and 'Samaria, are the chief seats of the two kingdoms, whither 'is the greatest resort of the whole nation. The Chaldee 'interprets it, who give names to their children, accord-'ing to the names of the chief of the heathen, to whom the 'house of Israel apply themselves for protection.—'Thus in the later times some of the Jews took the names 'of Alexander, Antipater, Agrippa, and the like, to com-'pliment some great men among the Greeks and Romans 'of those names.' (Lowth.)

V. 2. To show the people what little ground they had for their carnal security, the prophet calls on them to consider some of the neighbouring cities, which had once been flourishing, but probably were then in ruins. Had these cities been more favoured than the kingdoms of Judah and Israel? Or had they been more prosperous? Or was their border larger? That is, did they more deserve the indignation of God for their ingratitude? Or had they more to tempt the avarice of invaders? 'Calneh; a city 'in the region of Babylon; and, as it seems, lately sub-'dued by the Assyrians.' 'Gath, Uzziah, in whose 'reign Amos prophesied, took this city.' 'Better, greater; 'Why then do ye worship their gods? And why are you 'not grateful to Jehovah?' (Bp. Newcombe.) The prophet, however, seems to have meant to expose their presumption, rather than their ingratitude. Hamath the great: Not Hamath, afterwards mentioned. (14.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3—8. The persons addressed either thought that no evil would come upon them, or they considered it as very distant: and they supposed that there was no necessity at the present for repentance or reformation. As if they had been assured of prosperity and impunity, they "called for

"the seat of violence," and openly committed iniquity and oppression, under colour of law and justice. At the same time they laid down to sleep on beds ornamented with ivory, and reclined to feast upon magnificent couches; selecting the best of the lambs and calves for their luxurious and intemperate meals; regaling themselves with songs; inventing instruments of music for their carnal pleasure, as David had done for the honour of God and the service of the sanctuary; and drinking wine, not from small cups, but out of bowls, and to excess; and anointing themselves with the most costly ointments and perfumes. Thus they stupified their consciences, and rendered their hearts callous; so that they disregarded the miseries of their oppressed brethren, and the calamities occasioned to the people by famine, pestilence, and hostile invasions; and those which the prophets foretold were about to come upon them. But these selfish luxurious persons would be the first that would go into captivity; they would be torn away from their luxurious banquets, to penury, slavery, or death. For the Lord solemnly sware by himself, that he abhorred all the excellency of Jacob, or all those things on which the descendants of that patriarch valued themselves; whether they were riches, or strength, or outward privileges, or their empty profession of being God's people; especially their splendid palaces, which were builded and maintained by oppression: and he would therefore give them up to be plundered and desolated by the Assyrians and Chaldeans. The word rendered excellency, often means pride, or arrogance, which God especially abhors. 'These verses (4—6) are an elegant description of the ill 'uses men too often make of a plentiful fortune; that it 'shuts out all serious considerations, makes them void of 'compassion towards those that are in misery; and to re'gard nothing but the present gratification of their sen'ses.' 'The words allude to the afflicted state of Joseph, 'when he was sold by his brethren. (Lowth.)

V. 9—11. Previous to that final desolation of the city, the ravages of famine and pestilence would be so great, that none would survive of the most numerous families. Their relations would be constrained to burn the bodies, (which was not customary in Israel,) or bury the bones of the dead, with very little assistance, and in silence and astonishment. They would scarcely venture to express their griefs to their nearest neighbours and fellow-sufferers: and they would despair of pity or help from God, whom they would suppose to have utterly rejected them, and to be ready to add to their punishment, if they presumed to mention his name: thus they would pine away under these calamities, in terror, enmity, and despair. 'This obscure 'verse, (10) seems to describe the effects of famine and 'pestilence, during the siege of Samaria. The carcass 'shall be burnt, and the bones shall be removed, with no 'ceremony of funeral rites, and not without the assistance 'of the nearest kinsmen. Solitude shall reign in the 'house: and if one is left, he must be silent and retired, 'lest he be plundered of his scanty provisions.' (Bp. Newcombe.) For, at the Lord's command, both their stately palaces and the more humble habitations would be desolated with proportionable distress, and all ranks involved in one common ruin.

V. 12—14. It was as perilous to endeavour to reform the people, as it would be to ride a race on the top of a craggy rock, where both horses and horsemen would be in danger of being killed; and as vain as to plow there with oxen, when no impression could be made or increase expected. 'Is it impossible, that horses should run upon the 'steep and craggy clifts? So impossible is it that ye 'Israelites should continue to prosper, while ye remain 'thus sinful.' (Bp. Hall.) The ancients did not shoe their horses. The administration of public justice, and even their religious observances, had proved as nauseous as gall, and as poisonous as hemlock; instead of being a source, or an example, of equity and piety. Yet they continued to rejoice in their idols, their wealth, fortifications, or successes, which were things of no value; and they boasted of being able to provide for their own defence; which was as absurd as if an animal should suppose that it had assumed, or could assume, horns by its own strength. These boasts perhaps were occasioned by the successes of Jeroboam, (2 Kings xiv. 23—29.) The Lord would therefore raise up against them the Assyrians and Chaldeans, who would afflict, and at length desolate, the whole land from one end to the other. The mention of "the river of the wilderness," the border of the promised land on the south-west, shows that Judah, as well as Israel, was intended.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Careless sinners are every where in danger: but they who are at ease in Zion, and possess seared consciences and vain confidence, under the means of grace, are in the most perilous state; and no pre-eminence in rank or station in the Church, no distinction of sect or party, will secure those who are destitute of the sanctifying grace of God. Nay, every other advantage in this case will tend to increase pride, rebellion, and condemnation. Ungodly men are prone to put off the evil day: they presume that they shall live many years, and that they shall escape with impunity; or at least, that there is no danger yet, nor any need of repentance, self-denial, and prayer. Many of them seek to amass wealth by crimes, and spend it in every kind of self-indulgence, and continued pleasure and dissipation; whilst their ingenuity is employed in inventing new methods of gratification, to benumb their consciences and harden their hearts. No wonder then that they become insensible to the miseries of the poor, or to the persecutions of the Church; and that they spend that on their lusts, by which God should have been honoured and his people relieved: for they are continually neglecting, and even wilfully murdering their own souls! God must needs abhor the excellency, and hate both the palaces and temples of such professed Christians. Their carnal ease and riotous banquets will soon be removed: and how dreadful will it be, when luxury and excess shall end in hopeless and endless misery! Even on earth sinners may be so loaded with afflictions, or driven to desperation, that sullen silence and astonishment may seize upon them; and every thought of God, of prayer, or of Christ, may increase their agony, and every temper of hell may be experienced and manifested. Men should therefore take warning, not to stifle their convictions, or harden their hearts; and not to discourage the labours of ministers for their good: for if God give them up to obduracy, all efforts to bring them to repentance will be unavailing. Nothing tends more to this judicial obduracy than premeditated injustice, or confidence in our own wisdom, righteousness, and strength, in opposition to the word of God and from enmity to it: and "those who thus walk in pride, the LORD knoweth how "to abase," or to destroy.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—3. The Lord in vision showed Amos the judgments that he was about to bring upon Israel. He appeared to him as forming grasshoppers, or locusts, in order to send them forth to waste the land. It is probable, that the king was used to take a great part of the first mowing of the meadows, for the provender of his horses; so that the cattle of the people chiefly depended on the second growth, and the failure of that supply would have greatly distressed them. The prophet, seeing in his vision this calamity coming on them, and fearing that it would be inflicted in reality, earnestly interceded for his people, that the Lord would forgive their sin, and remit their punishment: for if he thus proceeded against them, by whom could Jacob, or his Church, be recovered from its present enfeebled and desolate condition? This plea, in which the honour of God was so concerned, prevailed; and the Lord remitted, or mitigated, the punishment.—Some suppose this to have been an emblem of the first invasion of the Assyrians, which was not so fatal as might have been expected. After Ahab and his family had reduced Israel to the brink of ruin, they began to revive again under the government of Jehu, his son Joash, and his grandson Jeroboam: yet desolations awaited them from the Assyrians, which would soon begin; but they would be restrained, or retarded, in answer to the prayers of the prophets. (Marg. Ref.) It is probable, that Amos made known to the people these visions, in order, as he received them.

V. 4—6. God next showed the prophet, that he was preparing to contend with Israel by fire; either by excessive heat and drought, or lightning, or the breaking forth of subterraneous fires. This appeared to him to waste, not only the rivers, but the waters of the ocean, as well as to consume a part of the people; which implied, that entire ruin was threatened, and was begun to be inflicted. This 7 Thus he shewed me: and, behold, the LORD stood upon [m] a wall made by a plumb-line, with a plumb-line in his hand.

8 And the LORD said unto me, [n] Amos, what seest thou? And I said, A plumb-line. Then said the LORD, Behold, I will set a plumb-line in the midst of my people Israel: [o] I will not again pass by them any more.

9 And [p] the high-places of Isaac shall be desolate, and the sanctuaries of Israel shall be laid waste; and [q] I will rise against the house of Jeroboam with the sword.

10 ¶ Then Amaziah [r] the priest of Beth-el sent to Jeroboam king of Israel, saying, Amos [s] hath conspired against thee in the midst of the house of Israel: the land is [t] not able to bear all his words.

11 For [u] thus Amos saith, [x] Jeroboam shall die by the sword, [y] and Israel shall surely be led away captive out of their own land.

12 Also Amaziah said unto Amos, [z] O thou seer, [a] go, flee thee away into the land of Judah, and there [b] eat bread, and prophesy there:

13 But [c] prophesy not again any more at Beth-el: [d] for it is the king's * chapel, and it is the † king's court.

14 Then answered Amos, and said to Amaziah, I was no prophet, [e] neither was I a prophet's son; but I was [f] an herdman, and a gatherer of ‡ sycamore-fruit:

15 And the LORD [g] took me § as I followed the flock, and the LORD said unto me, [h] Go, prophesy unto my people Israel

16 Now therefore [i] hear thou the word of the LORD; thou sayest, [k] Prophesy not against Israel, [l] and drop not thy word against the house of Isaac.

17 Therefore thus saith the LORD; induced the prophet to renew his former plea, and with similar success; and the more tremendous effects of the judgment were prevented. Some understand this of the ravages that Tiglath-pilezer made in the land, which only occasioned temporary and partial calamities, though they threatened entire desolation. (2 Kings xv. 29.)

V. 7—9. The Lord next appeared to Amos upon a wall, that had been formed by a plumb-line: this might represent the Church of Israel, as originally formed according to those rules which God, in infinite wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness, had prescribed by Moses. The plumb-line in his hand implied, that he was examining with exactness how far the people had deviated from their rule and original constitution, being about to judge and punish them according to their sins. This vision seems to have discouraged the prophet's intercession: he saw their idolatries and iniquities to be so many and heinous, and the judgments predicted against them to be so righteous, that he could say nothing to it. But the Lord, having called his strict attention to the vision, showed him that he was about to proceed against Israel in exact justice; that the threatened punishment should not be remitted; that the strong-holds, cities, and idolatrous temples, should be desolated; and that this would begin in the destruction of the family of Jeroboam by the sword of a conspirator. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10, 11. Amaziah, the chief priest, or president over the idolatrous worship at Beth-el, was greatly displeased with Amos for declaring these visions at that place; and especially for the last, which he had not prayed to be averted. Probably he feared lest it should set the people against the worship of the golden calves, undermine his credit and interests, and even alienate them from the established government. He therefore sent word to Jeroboam, (who seems to have been then at Samaria,) accusing the prophet of having conspired against him, and of exciting the people to revolt and rebellion: so that the land was not able to bear all his words, and would certainly be greatly injured, unless he were silenced and punished. But he offered no proof of this conspiracy, except Amos's predictions of approaching judgments: and in reporting his words he bare false witness against him; for he had not said, that "Jeroboam should die by the sword;" but that the Lord "would rise against his house with the "sword," which took place after Jeroboam's death, in the murder of his son Zachariah by Shallum, who succeeded him. (2 Kings xv. 8—12.) 'He traduces the prophet 'as a stirrer up of sedition. The same crime was object-'ed to Jeremiah, to Christ, and to St. Paul. (Marg. Ref.) (Lowth.)

V. 12, 13. It does not appear that Jeroboam noticed Amaziah's information, either despising the prophet and his predictions, or having a more favourable opinion of him than to suspect him of any bad design. But Amaziah was desirous of driving him away by any means. He therefore ironically called him a seer, or a prophet; but intimated that he only meant to get a livelihood by that employ: and he advised or charged him to flee away from Beth-el into the land of Judah, where he would be more welcome, and fare better than in Israel. He must, however, by no means prophecy any more at Beth-el, which was the king's chapel, where his established worship was conducted and graced with his presence, and where he had a palace and kept his court. It was therefore indecent for him to revile the king's religion, and denounce the judgments of God against him and his family and people, in the very place where his chapel and court were!—"Thou shalt not add to prophesy." (Heb.)

o 2 Kings xv. 29. xvii 6. Ez. iv. 13. Hos ix. 3. p 11 Lev. xxvi. 33—39. Jer. xxxvii. 27—32.

V. 15—17. Amos answered Amaziah with great boldness, yet with modesty and propriety. He declared that he had not formerly been a prophet, nor was his father a prophet; nor had he been educated in the schools of the prophets. But he had been a herdman, and a gatherer of a fruit, (a wild fig,) which grew on some kind of sycamore-trees, and was used for food by the poor people, or perhaps for the cattle. In these rural occupations he had been inured to hard labour and homely fare: and he had followed them contentedly, till the Lord, by express revelation, commanded him to go and prophesy to his people. Yet Amaziah, in direct opposition to the divine mandate, forbade his prophesying against Israel, or dropping a word against that people at Beth-el! The prophet was therefore commissioned to denounce sentence against him; that his wife, either through extreme indigence or licentiousness, should become a harlot in the streets of Beth-el; that his children should be slain by the sword of war or of the murderer; that his estate should be divided by line among those who seized on it; that he should die in a heathen land; and that Israel would surely go away into captivity.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The prayers of pious ministers and believers avert many calamities from churches and nations, which would otherwise overwhelm them. They who most faithfully denounce the terrors of the Lord against sinners, should be most earnest in prayers for their repentance and forgiveness. The low estate of the Church, and of any part of it, may be pleaded with God as a reason why he should pardon and spare it; for it is his cause: he would be deprived of his revenue of worship and honour, should it be totally ruined; and none but he can raise Jacob from his low estate, when he is so weak and hath so many and powerful enemies. Our gracious God will for a time regard his people's prayers for their irreligious neighbours and relatives, and defer the execution of deserved punishment; but he will at length examine the cause of every community and individual by the line and standard of his word: and then all the unbelieving and impenitent will be condemned; and even they who have before most pleaded in their behalf, will have no more to say for them.

V. 10—17.

No fervent prayers, or self-denying labours of ministers, can induce proud sinners to bear with their faithful reproofs and warnings. They will be accused of wishing for those miseries, which they warn men to flee from; their opposition to established impieties and iniquities will be construed into disaffection, or rebellion against the king or commonwealth; and their ministry will often be considered as an intolerable grievance. Men in general cannot bear with their alarming and reproving words; but mercenary and ambitious priests, the ringleaders of superstition or idolatry, will be the most inveterate and intolerant. Such have commonly been false accusers of the Lord's servants to princes, and the first movers of persecution: for their reputation, authority, and quiet enjoyment of their preferments, are endangered by the prevalence of truth and righteousness. Sometimes, however, even irreligious or idolatrous princes have not been disposed to listen to their insinuations, or to adopt their counsels; and they have been forced to employ menaces against those whom they would have more imperiously silenced, if they could: or they have given them counsel that savoured of their own character. Such men will perhaps intimate where and how ministers are most likely to obtain preferment or to escape the cross; but not where good may be done to souls. They consider it as the extreme of folly, insolence, or rusticity, to declare alarming offensive truths before the great; or where error, impiety, and vice, are sanctioned by high authority, long established customs, or eminent examples; as if smooth and soothing heresies alone were fit to be prophesied in the chapels of kings, and soft deceitful words alone would pass current in their palaces! And as if it were the enviable prerogative of royalty and privilege of nobility, to tread unmolested and unadmonished the broad road to everlasting misery! Indeed, none should intrude themselves into such places and services: nor are all, that are called to the ministry, qualified to assault iniquity, impiety, infidelity, or superstition, in these strong holds. But when the Lord has work to do of an extraordinary kind, he will raise up and furnish proper instruments for it. In doing this, he often deviates from men's rules, and takes such as have not been regularly educated; but perhaps were engaged in some laborious occupation, where they were inured to hardship, kept at a distance from the luxuries and indulgences of the affluent, and taught indifference to the interests and splendour of the world. They, however, who are selected to these services, must declare the whole word of God, without reserve, or respect of persons, to princes, or people, whatever treatment they may be exposed to: and they who oppose, or attempt to silence them, will do it at their peril. We cannot indeed speak too humbly of ourselves and our poor attainments and services, but as ministers we ought to "magnify our office:" and though we ought not to apply the denunciations or examples of God's word, personally to our opposers; yet we should not hesitate to declare, that they who despise the least of those whom the Lord sends forth to preach his word, are despisers of him; and that all who injure them, may expect severe rebukes, in their families, persons, and circumstances, and even fatal effects to their souls, except they repent. Nor can they prevent any of those judgments, the denunciation of which offends them; whilst their opposition provokes God to contend with them in particular.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—3. Under the emblem of a basket of summer fruit, which must be used immediately or it will perish, the speedy approach of the predicted judgments upon Israel was denoted, for which they were fully ripe. This may be supposed to have begun in the murder of Zachariah the son of Jeroboam: as the subsequent contests, between the successive usurpers of the throne, made way for the Assyrian invasions, which terminated in the entire ruin of the kingdom of Israel. These approaching events would turn the songs that were used in the temple of Bethel, &c. or those of their idol-temples, or in the palace, into howlings of terror and despair. Numbers would die in every place by the sword, pestilence, and famine, whose bodies the survivors would cast forth without the customary solemnities of burial; as hardened in grief and regardless of their nearest friends and relatives, through anxious concern for their own safety.

V. 4—10. The rich and powerful were exceedingly addicted to injustice and oppression, as well as ringleaders in impiety and idolatry: and the approaching calamities would fall more heavily on them than on others. They ought therefore to consider how they might escape, or how they could endure such miseries; instead of oppressing the poor, as if they would devour and extirpate them by their exactions. It seems, that commerce was suspended, even in Israel, on the new moons and sabbath-days, which they observed with some forms of devotion: but this was a weariness; and the covetous oppressors were ready to say to themselves, and to each other, 'When will this tedious 'day be over? When will this task of religion be done?' They wanted to return to worldly pursuits: they were in haste to set forth corn to sale, in order to increase their riches. In managing this traffic, which so nearly concerned the labouring poor, they made the ephah, or bushel, too small, and thus cheated in the quantity of what they sold; and they weighed the silver, with which they were paid, by too heavy a weight, and thus cheated in the sum which they took for it; nay, they used artifice in the act of weighing, and imposed in that way also on their customers; and they even took advantage of the people's necessities, to sell the refuse corn, which was scarcely fit for use. By these methods the poor became their debtors, and they obtained permission to sell them for slaves; which they inhumanly took advantage of, when they gained but a very trivial sum by depriving them of liberty; (ii. 6.) But the Lord sware by himself, who was the real excellency, or most honourable distinction, of his people, that he would never forget or omit to punish any of their works. These crimes would provoke him to send upon them such judgments as would make the land to tremble, as in an earthquake: it would be desolated by overwhelming calamities from one end to another, as Egypt is annually covered by an inundation of the Nile: their prosperity and hopeful prospects would be suddenly darkened, as if the sun should go down at noon-day, and the clear light should be exchanged for midnight darkness: their idolatrous or sensual feasts, and the songs accompanying them, would be turned into lamentations; every expression of extreme grief and dejection would be universally employed by the survivors, as if each of them had lost an only child; and instead of a joyful end to their troubles, they would terminate most bitterly, in the captivity and dispersion of the nation.

V. 11—14. In accession to all the outward miseries, the remnant of Israel would be visited with a famine, not of bread only, and with thirst not for water only, but of hearing the words of the LORD; and they would wander far and wide to seek information of the will of God respecting them, and yet lose their labour. The kingdom of Israel seems to have been favoured with fewer prophets during some time before the Assyrian captivity, than in former ages. After that catastrophe, the motley people and religion of the Samaritans succeeded in the land. The dispersed Israelites were either incorporated with the heathen, or lived without prophets, or teachers qualified to explain the Scriptures to them, and far removed from divine ordinances and means of grace: nor could any of their efforts or inquiries supply this want to their souls. But some think, and not improbably, that the present state of the Jews was also predicted. After they rejected Christ and his apostles and ministers, they were punished with a famine and thirst of the words of God: and in vain have they ever since sought and waited for another Messiah, or other teachers, to instruct them in his truth and will. In that day it was predicted, the fair virgins and young men would faint for thirst; which may mean, that the most amiable and zealous, who were best disposed to religion, would rest in outward forms and decency of conduct; and being destitute of "the wells of salvation," would at last perish for want of that water of life, which Christ alone can bestow. Thus they who swore, as an act of solemn worship, by the idols that were the sin of Samaria; by the golden calf that was the god of Dan; and by the idol that was worshipped at Beer-sheba, after the manner prescribed there by its priests; would at length be punished. Though this was a dead idol, they swore by it as the living God! But they would fall to rise no more.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We should carefully notice, and deduce instruction from every discovery which it may please God to afford us of his truth and will. Nothing tends more to alarm the consciences of careless sinners, than a conviction that their end draws near, and that the Lord is about to punish them for their transgressions: but if men will not take warning, and improve present mercies and opportunities, their carnal mirth, self-confident joy, and hypocritical songs of praise, will soon end in howlings of terror and despair. They who are most averse to hear the awful messages of God, should on some occasions be more directly addressed.—Times of public calamity will be peculiarly dreadful to the sensual, the avaricious, and the secure. The ordinances of God must be a weariness to the carnal mind: the sabbath will therefore either be profaned, or be a dull and heavy day; the sermon and service will be thought intolerably tedious; the return of these seasons will be considered as a sad deduction from the enjoyment, or interruption of the business of life; for such persons are all the time out of their element. And could we witness the fraudulent and covetous practices which in diversified forms render the mercantile transactions of numbers an abomination to the Lord, we should not wonder to see them so averse to the worship of God, or so soon weary of it: for their consciences cannot but be at some times disquieted, as well as their darling pursuits interrupted, by such spiritual exercises. But what place will they be fit for in another world, who have here delighted in iniquity and ungodliness? They may conceal their works, or forget them; but the Lord registers them all in his book of remembrance: and, seeing nations tremble and mourn for sin, and dark and gloomy calamities overspread the most flourishing kingdoms, and turn all their joys into howlings and distress, what will be the weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth, that sinners will experience, in that bitter day, which will succeed to their sinful and sensual pleasures? No earthly calamity should be so much dreaded, as the want of the instructions of God's word and the means of grace: this is a far more fatal famine, than that which only kills the body; as it tends to the miserable perdition of the immortal soul. This judgment is often inflicted on those who abuse, despise, or neglect the Gospel; and who prefer antiscriptural notions and forms to the religion of the Bible. When God in anger thus visits a degenerate church, their own schemes and endeavours, to find out a way of salvation, will stand them in no stead. Let us then value and seek to profit by our peculiar advantages, and fear provoking God to deprive us of them: and let it be remembered, that even if these blessings be continued in our land, death will soon remove ungodly men to that place, where there is no repentance unto salvation, and where the filthy continue filthy still; for they who fall into that pit of destruction, shall rise no more for ever.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1—4. The altar, on which the prophet in vision saw the Lord standing and giving orders for the destruction of the temple and the worshippers, is generally understood of the altar at Bethel: for the sacrifices offered there to the golden calf chiefly provoked God to take vengeance on Israel. He therefore from thence commissioned the Assyrians to smite the lintel of the door, and cause its posts and pillars to shake; to destroy that temple, and put an end to that idolatry; and mortally to wound the king, princes, priests, and people, who worshipped there; for he was determined to slay the last of them by the sword of his vengeance, from which there should be no method of escape. But as the vision seems to coincide with some predictions of the Lord's departure from the temple at Jerusalem; (Notes, Ez. viii. ix. x. xi;) so it may be questioned, whether that event were not also intended by the spirit of prophecy. The devoted objects, however, of the divine indignation, would find no place of refuge from their omnipresent and omnipotent Avenger. Could they even dig to the centre of the earth, or descend to the place of condemned spirits, his hand would there arrest them: could they climb up into heaven, his arm would cast them down: should they hide themselves in the rocks, at the summit of mount Carmel, he would search them out, and drag them from their recesses: or should they endeavour to elude his search by diving to the bottom of the ocean, he would order the serpent, or some destructive sea-monster, to bite or devour them there. The executioners of his vengeance would pursue them into every place whither they fled from them: and even the remnant, that would be dispersed as captives and slaves in the land of their enemies, would be followed by the murdering sword; as the Lord would watch over them for evil, and not for good. The contrast between hell and heaven, (2) shows that the unseen world, and not the grave, is here meant. (Note, Ps. xvi. 8—11.)

V. 5, 6. (Marg. Ref.) The eternal almighty God would even cause the land to melt like wax at his touch; and all the inhabitants to mourn, because of the wide spreading calamities that would follow. For it was he that formed and occupied the heavens as his chambers, or exalted, throne; who hath appointed the creatures of this lower world as a troop of his armies, to annoy his enemies; and who can, at his pleasure, bring all the waters of the ocean to cover the whole earth. 'The power and sure vengeance 'of the deity are very sublimely described in this and the 'four preceding verses.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 7—10. 'Are ye not under a curse, as the Ethio-'pians, the posterity of Ham, were, by reason of your 'multiplied sins and apostacies?' (Lowth.) (Notes, Gen. ix. 24, 25. x, 6, 7.) 'The sense seems to be, Trust not

'in your ancestors, who were so highly favoured by me. 'Your vices have made you vile in my sight. Trust not 'in my deliverance of you from the land of Egypt.— 'Other nations have been transplanted into fertile coun- 'tries as well as you, and particularly your neighbouring 'enemies.' (Bp. Newcombe.) Little is certainly known about the events here referred to: doubtless they were well known in the prophet's days. (Marg. Ref.) But though the Lord would destroy the sinful kingdom of Israel from off the earth; yet he would not utterly extirpate all the posterity of Jacob. He intended to scatter the remnant of them through all nations, and to harass them with manifold calamities, as the corn is shaken in the sieve: yet he would preserve all that were valuable of them with the most exact care, and not suffer one of them to perish. The astonishing preservation of the Jews as a distinct people, through all their dispersions, to the present day, is here evidently predicted. 'I will mingle the Israelites among 'all nations, just as good and bad grain are mingled in a 'sieve; but will so order it, that none of the good grain 'shall be lost.' (Lowth.) 'Though I will thus mix the 'Israelites with distant nations, yet there shall be a ge- 'neral restoration of them to their own land. The most 'secure and presumptuous sinners of the Israelites shall 'fall by the sword.' (Bp. Newcombe.) The whole house of Jacob, the families brought out of Egypt, are here certainly intended, and not the ten tribes only, which are never spoken of in this manner.

V. 11, 12. (Note, Acts xv. 16, 17.) This passage is quoted by the apostle James, in the sense, though not in the exact words, of the Septuagint, which varies considerably from the present Hebrew text. 'On the resto- 'ration of the Jews after their captivity, the Messiah 'came, and the Gentiles, (or the rest of mankind besides 'the Jews,) were admitted into the Church: and on the 'future grand restoration of the Jews, the borders of the 'Christian Church will be enlarged among the Gentiles.' (Bp. Newcombe.) The foregoing prophecy, evidently included the rejection of the Jews and their dispersion by the Romans, with which the establishment of Christ's kingdom was connected. The palace of David became a tabernacle, by the defection of the ten tribes and by subsequent calamities: but this tabernacle fell down at the Babylonish captivity, and it lay in ruins till the coming of Christ: so that these expressions may denote the mean estate of David's family, the degeneracy of Judah, and the low ebb of true religion. But by the incarnation and birth of Christ, the seed of David, and in consequence of his death, resurrection, ascension, and heavenly exaltation, that tabernacle was again erected, its breaches were closed, its ruins repaired, and it was advanced to far greater prosperity, than in the days of David and Solomon. The kingdom of the son of David became conspicuous, glorious, and extensive; it acquired the ascendency over its enemies, many of whom became the subjects of Christ; and this was the case among the Heathen nations in general: they were called by the grace, and by the name, of Christ, who is the Lord JEHOVAH, here spoken of, that predicted and performed all these things: for the Gentile converts, as well as other Christians, were called by the name of Christ, and called upon his name. Whether we adhere to the present Hebrew text, or, on the authority of the Septuagint, as quoted by the apostle, admit a trifling alteration, it is plain, that the conversion of the Gentiles, and not the reducing of them to subjection, is predicted. "That they "may be heirs with the remnant of Edom, and with all the "nations which are called by my name."

V. 13—15. 'As the prophecy in the foregoing verse 'was to commence from the coming of Christ, but not 'to receive its full completion till the fulness both of Jews 'and Gentiles come into the Church; so these verses ought 'to be understood of the happy state of the Millennium, 'which may be supposed to begin after the Jews are 'restored to their country.' (Lowth.) 'This part of 'the prophecy will receive its completion, on the future 'restoration of the Jews to their land.' (Bp. Newcombe.) The passage may have some reference to the primitive times; but will receive a more glorious accomplishment in those expected events which all the prophets more or less foretold. The plenteous harvest would take up so much time in gathering in, that the plowman preparing to sow for the ensuing crop would overtake the reaper; whilst the treader out of the grapes would immediately follow; all hands would be full of business, and all meet with encouragement and advantage; this represents the great diligence and success of the preachers of the Gospel, and the vast numbers of flourishing and joyful converts which they shall then make. The mountains dropping sweet wine, and the hills melting into rivulets of wine or oil, denotes the exceeding consolations and fruitfulness of believers, through the abundant influences of the Holy Ghost upon their souls. Then the Lord will bring again the captivity of his people, and they will be planted and prosper in their own land, and will no more be pulled up out of it. This cannot be interpreted of the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity; for they were afterwards driven out of their land by the Romans, and continue excluded from it to this day; so that the future conversion of the Jews, and their restoration to their own land, and the security and felicity of the Church in times to come, must be here predicted. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Hypocrisy and obstinate preference of human inventions to God's appointments, render men's religious observances their most heinous and ruinous crimes. Wherever ungodly men flee to hide themselves, they meet the frown and vengeance of their offended Sovereign, which would suffice to turn a local heaven into a real hell. Wretched then must they be, on whom the Lord sets his eyes for evil, and not for good; for all creatures are ready at his command to pursue and fight against his enemies. When professed Christians copy the crimes of infidels or idolaters, they become still more abominable in the sight of God: and no external advantages or favours can prove us the objects of his special love. Whilst he watches over sinful kingdoms, to destroy them, he will not fail to preserve his Church. His servants may be scattered, persecuted, tempted, and harassed in a variety of ways; but not one of them shall be lost: for the least true believer shall infallibly be taken care of, through all the revolutions of nations, in the hour of death, and amidst the convulsions of expiring nature: but the tares will be gathered from amidst the wheat, and cast into the fire to be burned; and then hypocrites will know the truths of those threatenings which they here presumptuously despised. Blessed be God, we live in the days when the kingdom of David is set up, in the Person of his Son, the divine Redeemer, and we Gentiles are become his possession and are called by his name: let us be thankful for our privileges, and endeavour to walk worthy of them. Yet we still witness many breaches in the tabernacle of our King: many divisions, abuses, and scandals, yet deform the Church; the power of godliness is declined in many parts of it, and others are harassed by oppressions and persecutions; and a great part of mankind yet continue strangers and enemies to the Gospel: we should therefore continue in prayer for the complete performance of these predictions, in the more perfect peace, purity, and beauty of the Church; in the increase of diligent, able, faithful, and successful ministers; in the ruin of all obstinate enemies; and in the conversion of Jews, Gentiles, and Mahometans, to the faith of Christ. But only in heaven shall we be so planted and established, as to experience no more changes, fears, temptations, sins, or sorrows; for there alone is fulness of joy for evermore.

BOOK OF OBADIAH.

It is probable, that Obadiah delivered this short prophecy about the time when Jerusalem was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar.—Obadiah signifies the servant of the Lord, which was a common name in Israel: but the prophet must be distinguished from all others that bare it.—He seems to have been contemporary with Jeremiah, and uses several of his expressions in prophesying against Edom, (Jer. xlix 7—22) and he concludes, (as almost all the other prophets do,) with predicting victory and prosperity to Israel and to the Church.

2 Behold, [e] I have made thee small among the heathen: thou art greatly despised.

NOTES.

V. 1, 2. Obadiah might be employed to deliver verbal messages to his people on other occasions; but this vision alone was preserved for the benefit of future generations. —The prophets had heard a report from the Lord, that ruin was preparing for the insulting enemies of the Jews; and ambassadors were sent about among the nations, to excite each other to war against the Edomites; by which means the Lord would shortly make them small and despised among their neighbours. (Note, Jer. xlix. 14, 15.)

V. 3—6. (Notes, Jer. xlix. 9, 10. 16.) The Edomites inhabited a mountainous country, which they had strongly fortified: they had for some time been prospered, and they proudly confided in their strength and munitions, and concluded that no enemy could prevail against them. But the Lord was become their adversary; and even if they could exalt themselves as much above their other enemies as the stars are out of the reach of man, or like the eagle which builds her nests in the loftiest cedars, yet the Lord would certainly bring them down, and their pride would only help to deceive and ruin them. With astonishment the prophet saw, as it were, their hostile invaders not only making depredations and slaughter, and then departing, but cutting off all their multitudes, and ransacking their most secret treasures, till they had plundered the whole of them.

7 All [p] the men of thy confederacy have brought thee even to the border: the * men that were at peace with thee have deceived thee, and prevailed against thee; † they that eat thy bread have laid a wound under thee: [q] there is none understanding in him.

8 Shall I not in that day, saith the LORD, [r] even destroy the wise men out of Edom, and understanding out of the mount of Esau?

9 And [s] thy mighty men, [t] O Teman, shall be dismayed, to the end that [u] every one of the [x] mount of Esau may be cut off by slaughter.

10 ¶ For thy [y] violence against thy brother Jacob, [z] shame shall cover thee, [a] and thou shalt be cut off for ever.

11 In the day that thou stoodest on the other side, [b] in the day that the strangers carried away ‡ captive his forces, and foreigners entered into his gates, and [c] cast lots upon Jerusalem, [d] even thou wast as one of them.

12 But § thou shouldest not have [e] looked on the day of thy brother, in the day that he became a stranger; neither shouldest thou have [f] rejoiced over the children of Judah in the day of their destruction; neither shouldest [g] thou have ‖ spoken proudly in the day of distress.

13 Thou shouldest not have entered into the gate of my people in the day of their calamity; yea, thou shouldest not have [h] looked on their affliction in the day of their calamity, nor have laid hands on their * substance in the day of their calamity;

14 Neither shouldest thou have stood in the cross-way, to cut off those of his that did escape; neither [i] shouldest thou have † delivered up those of his that did remain [k] in the day of distress.

15 For [l] the day of the LORD is near upon all the heathen: [m] as thou hast done, it shall be done unto thee: thy reward shall return upon thine own head.

16 For [n] as ye have drunk upon my holy mountain, so shall all the heathen drink continually, yea, they shall drink, and they shall ‡ swallow down, [o] and they shall be as though they had not been.

17 ¶ But [p] upon mount Zion [q] shall be § deliverance, and ‖ there shall be holiness; and the house of Jacob shall [r] possess their possessions.

18 And the house of Jacob [s] shall be a fire, and [t] the house of Joseph a flame, and the house of Esau [u] for stubble, and they shall kindle in them, and devour them; [x] and there shall not be any remaining of the house of Esau; for the LORD hath spoken it.

19 And they of [y] the south shall possess the mount of Esau; and they of [z] the plain the Philistines: and they shall possess [a] the fields of Ephraim, and the fields of Samaria: and [b] Benjamin shall possess Gilead.

V. 7. These calamities would be brought upon Edom by the defection and treachery of all their confederates; who would march to their borders as if to assist them, and induce them to go forth to meet them as friends, and so deceive and prevail against them. The very troops that took pay to defend them would most fatally assault them; nor would they have understanding to see or avoid this danger, or to take warning from this prediction. Those 'that were maintained at thy cost, as thine allies, have giv-'en thee a secret blow which thou wast not aware of.' (Lowth.) The Edomites seem to have been joined in alliance with the Chaldeans, and tributary to them, when Jerusalem was taken: but within about five years after, they and their confederates invaded and desolated Edom.

V. 10—14. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Ps. cxxxvii. 7. Ez. xxv. xxxv. Am. i. 11, 12.) The prophet shows what the conduct of Edom towards his brother Jacob ought to have been; and thus, with peculiar energy, by the implied contrast, exposes the cruelty, violence, insolence, rapacity, and treachery, which he had committed, in various ways, during the distresses of the nation.

V. 15, 16. Israel and Judah had experienced a day of the Lord's righteous judgment on them for their sins, by the hands of the Assyrians and Chaldeans; whilst the Gentiles seemed to escape with impunity, and to prosper in their wickedness: but the day of the Lord was at hand, in which he would judge all those nations that had injured his people, and retaliate their oppressions upon them. The Jews had drunk the cup of God's indignation, even on mount Zion; and the Heathen should drink continually and abundantly of the same cup, until they were utterly destroyed. The ruin of the several nations, that bordered on and had fought against Israel, was predicted; but they were types of the enemies of the Christian Church, who will be utterly destroyed in due season. (Notes, Is. xxxiv. lxiii. 1—6.) 'The prophet speaks of the Jews here as 'already under a state of captivity; as they actually were 'before this prophecy was fulfilled.' (Lowth.)

V. 17—21. When this prophecy was delivered, mount Zion either lay desolate, or was about immediately to be desolated, while the enemies of the Jews had dominion over them. "But upon mount Zion shall be those that "escape," or (an escaping;) "and it shall be holy." (Bp. Newcombe.) Thus it was foretold, that there would be deliverance and holiness at Jerusalem, and the house of Jacob would again occupy their ancient possessions. Then Israel and Judah would become as a flame, to consume the Edomites as stubble, till they were utterly destroyed: and the remnant of the people, that were at that time captives, would not only possess the land of Canaan, but the adjoining districts; which they would take out of the hands of those who now oppressed them.—The remaining tribes would possess the country which had belonged to those who continued in their dispersions, to the utmost borders of the promised land, and even beyond them. Thus Judah would possess mount Seir, to the south; and another company the land of the Philistines, towards the west; and others would recover possession of mount Ephraim and Samaria, though at that time possessed by strangers. Benjamin would inherit Gilead, beyond Jordan, which the Ammonites had seized on: and the residue of the ten tribes would gain possession of all the country formerly inhabited by the Canaanites, even to Zarephath, or Sarepta, which bordered on Zidon. It is not agreed, what is meant by Sepharad; but some think that it was the name of a city in Edom, which the remnant of those who were led captive from Jerusalem would possess, with the cities of the south. For saviours, or deliverers, would be raised up on mount Zion, to judge and execute vengeance on the Edomite; and the kingdom, or dominion, would actually be possessed and exercised by JEHOVAH, for the benefit of his worshippers. This prophecy was accomplished, when the Jews returned to their own land by Cyrus's decree; when the temple was rebuilded, and the worship of God restored; when Jerusalem was re-established in prosperity, and the land replenished with inhabitants; when the Jews, under the Maccabees and other leaders, entirely subjugated the Edomites, and incorporated the remnant of them amongst themselves as proselytes; and in their subsequent prosperity, till the days of Christ. No mention is made of the Philistines by Christ or his apostles. They seem, before that time, to have been extirpated from the land. But the salvation and holiness of the Gospel, its success and spread, by the faithful preaching of the word, and the conversion of the Gentiles, were also intended; especially the future restoration of the Jews, the destruction of antichristian opposers, and that prosperous state of the Church, to which all the prophets evidently bear witness. Then, and not till then, in the full sense of the words, shall "the kingdom be the "LORD'S."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The Lord exalts, or abases, and renders nations honourable, or contemptible, as he sees good. Self-confidence, reliance on external advantages, ambitious projects, and carnal security, uniformly tend to calamity and contempt; and thus the pride of men's hearts deceives them. No exaltation or power can secure those whom God is concerned in honour to bring down. Renowned warriors are generally the most rapacious and insatiable of all thieves and robbers: the prosperity of others only excites their appetite for plunder; and so riches tend to the ruin of their possessors. They who rely on plausible and mercenary helpers, are deficient in understanding: for there is so much treachery in man, that such persons commonly give their confederates the most fatal wounds. They only are happy who trust in the Lord; for in the day of his displeasure, he destroys the wisdom of the prudent, and mars the courage of the mighty, that all his enemies may receive deserved punishment.

V. 10—21.

God will surely confound those who oppress their brethren of the same nature with themselves; and those especially who hate such as the Lord loves, and afflict them because they belong to him. They who rejoice in the calamities which others inflict will be numbered among oppressors; and all that would escape their doom must take care not to sanction their cruelties by their presence, or approbation. It is criminal to behold with the least degree of satisfaction, or even without deep concern, the distresses of our neighbours; and still more so to insult over them under their calamities. If we cannot enter the doors of the oppressed and afflicted to sympathize with them, and to soothe or relieve their sorrows, we had better keep at a distance, lest we should increase, or appear to take pleasure in, their misery. How base then must they be, who seize on such opportunities to lay hands on the property of their neighbours, or to wreak their revenge or satiate their cruelty, by giving assistance to the principal actors in such bloody tragedies! But let both the sorrowful believer and the insolent oppressor know, that the day of the Lord is near upon all the heathen: that the injuries which the persecuted have endured will be recompensed upon their persecutors, who will drink of that cup, which they have been instrumental in putting into the hands of others; and that the troubles of the righteous will soon be over, but those of the wicked will be eternal and complete. Happy then is the inhabitant of Zion, even in the most afflicted times: there alone is deliverance from the wrath to come and from every evil; there holiness is communicated and resides: and whilst the Lord purifies his redeemed "from all their iniquities, to be unto "himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works," he both marks them out as his own, and prepares them to possess their purchased inheritance. His people will also be victorious, and as a flame to consume their enemies; and they shall inherit all things, whilst others shall lose even what they seemed to have. Blessed be God, for the divine Saviour and Judge on mount Zion; and for those whom he sends forth as instruments of bringing sinners to partake of his salvation! May all employed in this work be faithful and successful! so that their word may be a savour of life unto life to numbers, and a savour of death unto death to all that reject it, as judging and condemning obstinate unbelievers; and in both respects a sweet savour to the Lord, whose is "the kingdom, and the power, and the "glory, for ever, Amen."

BOOK OF JONAH.

Jonah was no doubt more ancient than any of those prophets, whose writings are preserved in this part of the sacred Scripture.—He predicted the successes of Jeroboam, the son of Joash; (2 Kings xiv. 25;) and it is probable that the prophecy was delivered a considerable time before its accomplishment. Some think, that Jonah executed his prophetical office as early as the latter part of Jehu's reign: and it is not agreed whether the events recorded in this book, occurred at his entrance on that office, or at a later period.—Nothing more is known of him, except that he was of Gath-hepher, a town in the tribe of Zebulon, (Josh. xix 13: Gittath-hepher:) and the traditions extant concerning him are unworthy of the least notice.—The book before us is rather a narrative than a prophecy. Several of the events recorded in it are of a very extraordinary nature; which has induced some to explain it as an allegory, and emboldened others profanely to ridicule it. But it should be remembered, that our Lord himself hath repeatedly attested the truth of the narrative, and shown, that the most wonderful event in it was intended as a type or emblem of his own death, burial, and resurrection on the third day. (Matt. xii. 39—41. xvi. 4. Luke xi. 32.) The knowledge of "the power of God," as manifested by the Scriptures, will fully satisfy the humble mind respecting the miracles here recorded: and a deep knowledge of our own hearts will abate our astonishment at the extraordinary conduct of the prophet himself. 'The fame of Jonah's deliverance 'appears to have spread among the heathen nations: and the Greeks, who were accustomed to adorn the 'memory of their heroes, by every remarkable event and embellishment which they could appropriate, 'afterwards added to the fictitious adventures of Hercules, that of having continued three days without 'injury in the belly of a dog, sent against him by Neptune. The fable of Arion and the Dolphin, of 'which the date is fixed at a time nearly coeval with the period of Jonah, is possibly a misrepresentation 'of particulars recorded in this sacred book.' (Gray's Key.) Jonah lived almost as early as the most ancient of the Greek poets. His impartiality in recording his own sins, is peculiar to the sacred writers.

V. 2, 3. Nineveh, the capital of the Assyrian empire, was one of the largest cities that we read of; being sixty miles in circumference, if historians may be credited. Other prophets foretold the destruction of heathen cities for their crimes: but Jonah was ordered to go to Nineveh, that he might, on the spot, denounce the judgments of God against it. Some think, that he declined this service, because he was jealous for the honour of Israel, and was not willing that the Gentiles should partake of the benefits of prophecy; and he afterwards intimates, that he apprehended God would mercifully spare Nineveh, and that he should be despised and punished as a false prophet. (Note, iv. 1, 2.) But when we consider the perils and hardships, to which this journey and service were likely to expose him; when we imagine to ourselves the probable reception of a despised prophet of Israel in this proud idolatrous city, come avowedly to predict its speedy destruction; and that this might draw upon him the resentment both of the rulers and the multitude; when we reflect how such a message would be received in the streets of London at this day; we shall not wonder, that he was extremely reluctant to undertake the business. Strong faith, and a habit of unreserved obedience, were necessary, to overcome the reluctance that Jonah must have felt: and perhaps he was a young man, and not as yet inured to perilous services. He seems to have supposed that the Spirit of prophecy would not rest on him, if he left the land of Israel to go some other way than to Nineveh; he desired to be freed from those impulses, with which he had not courage and faith to comply; and he therefore purposed "to flee unto Tarshish from the "presence of the LORD." Accordingly he went to Joppa, a sea-port town, said to be about forty miles from Gath-hepher, where he is supposed to have dwelt, and in the opposite direction from Nineveh. There he met with a vessel about to sail to Tarshish, and paying the fare went aboard; as if he thought that now he should be removed to a distance from the immediate presence of God, and as not expecting to be pursued by a more imminent danger than any of those from which he fled.

Tarshish. 'Bochart says, that there were two places 'of this name; one, Tartessus in Spain—near the pillars 'of Hercules; the other in the Indian Ocean, near Ophir, '—which island is thought to be the modern Ceylon. To 'this latter men sailed from Ezion-geber on the Red Sea.' (Bp. Newcombe.) Some versions, however, and expositors, suppose Tarsus in Cilicia to be here meant.

V. 4—6. During the time which was occupied in this rebellious project, Jonah seems to have received no more impulses of the prophetic Spirit; but to have been left to great insensibility of conscience. A storm of wind was therefore commissioned to arrest the ship, and it was in the utmost danger of being wrecked. It seems that the tempest was of an extraordinary nature. The affrighted mariners, therefore, having some sense of a superior power, but no right knowledge of the true God, and being of different countries, cried every one to the idol that he had been used to worship, for deliverance from death: at the same time they cast overboard their merchandise, or tackling, to lighten the ship and preserve it from sinking. Yet during all this confusion and hurry, Jonah lay asleep below deck, and heard nothing of the matter; having perhaps had little sleep for some time, through fatigue and uneasiness. This caused the ship-master to address him as a very stupid and indolent person, and to reprove him for sleeping, when all their lives were in such imminent peril; and to require him to arise, and call upon the God he had been used to worship, if so be he might be induced to regard, compassionate, and deliver them. Thus he who, as the messenger of JEHOVAH, ought to have been reproving the Ninevites, received a just and severe rebuke from an idolatrous mariner!

V. 7. The extraordinary nature of this tempest; and the general notions of a superior power, and of right and wrong, which these men entertained, induced them to conclude, that some atrocious criminal sailed with them, for whose cause this evil had befallen them. According therefore to the custom both of the Gentiles, and also of the Lord's worshippers, they agreed to decide, by casting lots, who the criminal was; this was an appeal to the heart-searching God and his providence; and he was pleased to determine the matter for them, by causing the lot to fall upon Jonah: (Marg. Ref.) 'This was an 'usual method of referring things to the appointment, or 'discovery, of Providence.' (Lowth.)

10 Then [d] were the men * exceedingly afraid, and said unto him, [e] Why hast thou done this? for the men knew that [f] he fled from the presence of the LORD, because he had told them.

V. 8—10. When Jonah was thus singled out as the culprit whom divine vengeance pursued, the mariners did not proceed against him with violence, as might have been expected, considering their loss and extreme danger: but, perhaps, perceiving something grave and serious in his demeanour, they calmly entreated him to inform them, whether he were not conscious of some great crime, for which this calamity was come upon them? And whether he could deny that it was on his account? They wanted to know what his employment was? whether lawful or not? Whether he were not now upon some criminal project, or fleeing from justice? and in short, who he was, and of what country, &c.? Accordingly, he without reserve informed them of his people and religion, as a worshipper of JEHOVAH the God of heaven, the Creator both of the sea and the dry land; and ingenuously confessed his heinous sin. This exceedingly alarmed them, either as it showed them the power of that God who was contending with them, and whom they knew not how to appease; or because they were in doubt how to behave towards his prophet, perceiving great danger, whether they retained him in the ship, or cast him over-board. They, however, remonstrated with Jonah for rebelling against the command, and attempting to flee from the presence of the great Creator; and for involving them as well as himself in such imminent danger.

V. 11—16. The mariners, perceiving that the tempest continued to increase, and not knowing how to act, inquired of Jonah himself, as JEHOVAH's prophet, What they ought to do in this emergency? And he, convinced of his sin and folly, submitting to the justice of God, and expecting death for his crime, and perhaps receiving some intimation of the divine will, counselled them to cast him into the sea; and thus the tempest would cease, for he knew that it was raised on his account. He would not, however, cast himself over-board, for that would have been an act of suicide. But the men, probably affected by the candid confession and the disinterested conduct of Jonah, and fearing to lay hands on the Lord's servant, used every effort to get into port; that putting him on shore, they might preserve his life and their own also. When they found their endeavours to be in vain, (as "the "sea grew more and more tempestuous;" Marg.) they prayed (not every one to his god as before, but) to JEHOVAH, entreating him that they might not perish for taking away Jonah's life, nor be deemed guilty of murdering the innocent; as his sovereign appointment had laid them under the necessity of doing this for their own preservation. After this appeal, they cast Jonah over-board: and as the storm immediately ceased, they were so impressed with what they had seen and heard, that they exceedingly feared the power and reverenced the authority of JEHOVAH, and worshipped his name; and either at that time, or as soon as they could, they offered to him sacrifices of thanksgiving for their deliverance, and made vows of becoming his servants and worshippers. We may conclude, that some of them at least were savingly converted, by means of these extraordinary transactions.—'Disclaiming all their idol-gods, they offered a sacrifice 'to the only true God, and made vows to him, (which 'they would certainly perform upon their return,) to wor-'ship him at Jerusalem.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 17. As it was the will of God to chastise Jonah, but not to cut him off; he had prepared a great fish near the ship to receive him into its stomach. Christ hath called it a whale, (Κητος) and repeatedly authenticated the whole narration; and probably some of that species have throats wide enough to swallow a man, though others may not. (Harg. Ref.) The whole affair was miraculous: the preservation of Jonah from suffocation in the belly of the whale could only be effected by a continued exertion of almighty power; and the most daring infidel will scarcely venture to say, that God could not prepare such a great fish for this purpose, and effect Jonah's deliverance in such a manner. In this situation Jonah remained for three days and three nights; at least, (according to the Hebrew phraseology one whole day and night and a part of two others. In this he was a type of Christ, as dead and buried, and rising again on the third day. 'The precise time was 'thus determined, to prefigure the period of our Lord's 'continuance in the grave.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

They who serve God in the work of the ministry, must prepare for unreserved obedience amidst manifold hardships and dangers; and should arm themselves with faith and patience, and a spirit of self denial. They must arise and go to every place, whither Providence calls them; and not spare to reprove the sins of the great or of the many, or to denounce against them the judgments of that God, before whom their crimes have been committed.—Unbelief and the fear of man start a thousand objections to such services; and even pious men are capable of most absurd notions and most extravagant actions, when desirous of escaping the cross, or declining obedience in perilous circumstances: nay, like Adam, they may be tempted to hide themselves from the presence of the Lord by flight, or by running among the trees of the garden! Thus some awakened sinners have removed from the places, preachers, or companions, that have disquieted them, in hopes of being again easy in their beloved sinful course of life: and thus even pious ministers, when greatly opposed or discouraged, are apt to wish for removals to some other place, and to think they could do better any where, or in any situation, than that assigned them by their Lord and Master! But there is always more danger in disobeying, than in obeying God: he can arrest his fugitives by storms from without or from within; and nothing but shame and distress can come on those who run away from their proper place and work. Sin and temptation may render even a believer, for a time, more insensible than the most ignorant heathen! in imminent danger, when natural conscience extorts from the latter a cry of distress to an imaginary or unknown god, and induces them to part with their possessions in hopes of saving their lives, the former may remain secure and asleep, without any sense of guilt or fear of wrath. But the Lord will rebuke and chasten those whom he loves; and the persons whom he sometimes employs for this purpose, serve to cover his offending servants with shame, and to fill them with anguish.—Surely the people of the world in general may be thus addressed. 'Shall men part with all their substance, to 'save their lives? And will they not renounce worldly 'interests and pleasures, to save their souls? What do men 'mean by sleeping on in sin, when the word of God and 'the convictions of their consciences warn them to arise 'and call upon the LORD, if they would escape everlast-'ing misery?' And do we not all need such reproofs on some occasions? What do we mean, amidst all our fears, temptations, difficulties, and perils, and those of the church or the community, to be so supine and heartless? Should we not admonish each other to awake, and arise, and call upon our God; if so be he would think upon and deliver us?

V. 11—17.

In great distresses it behooves us to inquire, on what account and for whose cause the evil is come upon us? And though it may not be deemed expedient to use the lot, amidst the abuse and profanation of it that prevails, yet we may appeal to the Lord in prayer; and by his word and Spirit, and in his providence, he can readily show us the cause and remedy of all our troubles. They who rebel against God, often occasion great calamities to those with whom they associate; yet they should not be treated with harshness or virulence; and careful inquiry should always precede the due punishment of culprits. When the true believer has been betrayed into sin, and is evidently become the criminal cause of harm to others; and when he is brought to a proper sense of his misconduct; he will frankly confess his guilt, and speak honourably of God, though to his own shame and condemnation: and indeed it may justly cause the profligate and profane to tremble, when they consider with what marked severity the Lord often punishes the transgressions of his worshippers. In such circumstances they will condemn themselves, and submit patiently to any temporal punishment, if so be they can hope to be delivered from the wrath to come: nay, they will rather choose chastisement in their own persons, than to become the occasions of ruin to others. (2 Sam. xxiv. 17.) Such behaviour will sometimes win upon the ungodly, when they cannot but see their criminality, and are suffering in consequence of it: and it is proper to do all we can to save the lives even of those who have greatly offended; for the natural conscience has a horror at the thoughts of wilful murder. When necessity constrains men to take away life, it should be done with extreme reluctance, and only in order to preservation from death, or for other important ends. And it ought not to be done, if it can be avoided by any tolerable loss or hardship; for the persons concerned should be able humbly to appeal to God that they could not avoid the painful expedient, and be confident that innocent blood will not be laid to their charge. When the cause of evil is removed, the effect will commonly cease; and the renunciation of sinful pleasures or interests makes way for a sweet sense of the pardoning love of God. His servants will scarcely ever be entirely useless; he often takes occasion, even from our sins and follies, to promote the glory of his name and the salvation of souls: and if men's lives be endangered and their property diminished, through their acquaintance with his worshippers, yet, if their discourse or example bring any to fear, trust, worship, and obey God, their gain will be great. Surely the conduct of these heathen mariners will rise up in judgment against numbers of those that are called Christians, who neither offer prayers in their distresses, nor sacrifices of thanksgiving for their most signal deliverances! The Lord will humble, but he will not destroy, his offending servants: and he can preserve, or punish, in numberless ways, of which we have no conception. But let us not overlook Him, who gave himself up to death, to rescue us from the wrath of God: the storm

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. Jonah was brought into such a situation as no man ever was in before or since: yet his life was not only preserved, but he was enabled to exercise his reason, and to collect his thoughts for prayer! He was reduced to this condition of extreme misery and peril, by the righteous judgment of God; he could not possibly be delivered, except by miracle; he must be oppressed with guilt and terror; yet he still hoped in God's mercy, and ventured to call upon him. His confinement, his guilt, and the state of his mind, rendered his situation as the belly of hell, or the state of the dead, where there is no hope, and whence there is no escape: yet even thence he cried unto the Lord, and was heard and delivered. 'Then 'Jonah spent that time in his earnest prayers to God, and 'in his humble and hearty confessions of his sin: and 'after, when he was by the power of God delivered, 'he penned this song of thanksgiving for so wonderful 'a mercy.' (Bp. Hall.) 'Those devout thoughts, which 'he had at that time, he afterward digested into the fol-'lowing prayer; and added a thanksgiving for his deliver-'ance to the end of it. So several of David's Psalms 'were probably composed after his trouble was over; but 'suitable to the thoughts he had at the time of his afflic-'tion, and with a grateful sense of God's mercies for his 'deliverance.' (Lowth.) 'Being now swallowed up of 'death, and seeing no remedy to escape, his faith burst 'out unto the Lord; knowing that from the very hell he 'was able to deliver him.'

V. 3, 4. The Lord had not only permitted and directed, but he had even constrained, the mariners to cast Jonah into the sea: so that he recognized the hand of God, and submitted to his justice in that dispensation. He was compassed about with floods of waters in the great deep; whilst all the waves and billows passed over him. He had attempted to flee from the presence of the Lord; and now he feared that he was cast out of his sight: yet he would not quite despair, but would still look to God for help, with a believing regard to his holy temple, the sacrifices there offered, and the mercy-seat, from which he communed with his people: he would still pray for forgiveness, and hope to be permitted again to go up to the temple, or at least to be admitted into the sanctuary above, if he died in his present situation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5—7. When Jonah was cast into the sea, the waters surrounded him, even to the soul or life, or so as to reduce him to the condition of a dying man: the sea-weeds were wrapped about his head, either before the fish swallowed him, or being sucked in with the water into its stomach. And thus he was carried to the bottom of the sea, and to the deep rooted bases of those mountains that formed the shore; and he seemed as effectually precluded from all hope of deliverance, as if he had been buried in the centre of the earth, and her perpetual rocks and hills had been the barriers of his tomb: yet from this pit of corruption the Lord brought him forth alive! Thus the Lord Jesus, having endured the wrath of the Father due to our sins, was laid in a new sepulchre hewn out of a rock, closed with a large stone, sealed, and guarded by Roman soldiers: yet from that pit of corruption he was brought forth alive by the power of God, without having seen corruption. When Jonah's heart fainted through terror and distress, he remembered the Lord, and his power, mercy, and truth; his prayer was heard in heaven and accepted; and thus he was delivered.

V. 8, 9. Jonah had been severely corrected: yet he was fully sensible how much better it was to worship God than to regard the idols of the heathen; or any of the superstitions that then prevailed. These were all deceitful vanities; in forsaking the Lord to observe them, men forsook their own mercies and privileges; and they were equally deluded, who sought safety and peace by disobeying God, as Jonah had done. He was now convinced of his folly; and was determined, if he should be delivered, that he would present his sacrifice of praise, with thankful acknowledgment of God's mercies, and pay the vows that he had made in his distress; for salvation, temporal, spiritual, and eternal, were from the Lord alone. This may be considered as his language after his deliverance; and some think that he vowed when in the fish's belly, that in case he was spared he would readily go to Nineveh, according as he had been commanded.

V. 10. Or "The LORD had spoken, &c.' He so over-ruled this monster of the deep, that it was influenced to get near the shore, and disgorge its prey alive upon the dry land; probably not far from the place where Jonah had embarked. Thus death and the grave were commanded to restore the body of the crucified Redeemer.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We cannot be in any place where we are excluded from the mercy-seat of God; and sharp afflictions are often sent to excite those to earnest cries for mercy, who were negligent in prosperity, and under the rebukes of his word.—Even believers may be reduced by sin, fear, temptation, affliction, and a sense of divine wrath, to a situation that bears some resemblance to the depths of hell: but their discouragements will differ from despair, in that they will never totally cease to seek help from God; and faith and hope will still struggle against the gloomy suggestions of unbelief. The hand of God should be acknowledged in all our troubles: a proper estimate should be formed of the greatness of our difficulties, and the urgency of our distresses; in order that our faith may be fixed more simply upon the power of the Lord for deliverance, and that afterwards we may be duly sensible of our obligations: and we should endeavour to attain to a proper sense of the greatness of our guilt, that we may more value his mercy and salvation. When we have been rescued from pressing difficulties, we should call to remembrance our fears and sorrows, and the weakness and wavering of our faith and hope: that we may be the more affected with the loving-kindness of the Lord in hearing our supplications; and that we may offer the sacrifices of thanksgiving, and pay our vows with greater alacrity and zeal. Our case can never be desperate, whilst we are out of hell: but, as far as a believer is tempted to copy those that "observe lying "vanities," he forsakes his own mercy, and lives below his privilege. For it is our happiness, that we may worship and hope in God, who is able and willing to save all that call upon him, from sin and its eternal consequences, and from its temporal and painful effects, as far as it is good for them: yea, "he is able to do exceeding abun-"dantly, above all that we ask or think." Amidst all our varying experiences and the changing scenes of life, we should keep the eye of faith fixed upon our once suffering and dying, but now risen and ascended Redeemer. All the waves and billows of the wrath of the Father, due to our sins, went over him; the floods of ungodly men compassed him, the powers of darkness assaulted him, death seemed to prevail against him, the grave was opened to receive his body, and his soul departed into the place of separate spirits: but he was again brought alive out of the pit of corruption, that through him the salvation of the Lord might be communicated to all believers. Let us then humbly confess our sins; consider his resurrection as the first-fruits of our own; and thankfully receive every temporal and spiritual deliverance, as the beginning and pledge of our eternal redemption.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—4. It was proper that Jonah should have his commission renewed, before he resumed his office, after his late perverse disobedience; and that he should prove the sincerity of his repentance by performing that service which before he had declined. He was therefore commanded to go and preach to Nineveh the preaching that God commanded him; and he promptly obeyed, without regard to consequences. Nineveh was so large a city, that it would take a man three days to walk round it, or to go into all the principal streets of it. When Jonah therefore came thither, and had entered into the city, he made one day's journey about it, proclaiming as the herald of JEHOVAH, that within forty days Nineveh would be overthrown, by some sudden judgment, such as had befallen Sodom. This respite and warning intimated that there was a reserved condition of mercy, in case they repented; and probably the proclamation was attended with reproofs of their most notorious sins. In his progress he met with no interruption; and it is probable that his first day's preaching produced such effects, as rendered it unnecessary for him to proceed any further. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5—9, 'Without question, a sense of their own 'guilt, and their deserving whatever punishment heaven 'should inflict, was a principal reason that moved them 'to have regard to his message. And by the men of Ni-'neveh repenting, at the preaching of Jonah, God de-'signed to upbraid the stubbornness of his own people, 'and shame them, as it were, into repentance, lest the 'men of Nineveh should rise up in judgment against 'them.' (Lowth.) Some think that Paul was king of Nineveh at this time; but it is probable that these events occurred before his days. There were no outward indications of the overthrow of Nineveh, and Jonah wrought no miracle in confirmation of his prediction: yet the Ninevites believed it to be the word of God, and that it would be verified; probably through a conviction excited in their minds of the greatness of their guilt, and from a recollection of the many wonderful judgments that Israel's God had inflicted on his enemies. Perhaps they had also heard of the wonderful things, which God had wrought in respect to Jonah. They therefore dreaded the threatened vengeance, yet had some hope of escaping it; and without delay they used every means which they could devise, in order to appease the wrath of God. For when the preaching of Jonah was made known to the king, he was so alarmed, that he laid aside all his ensigns of royalty, put on sackcloth, and sat among ashes: and, with the concurrence of his nobles and the approbation of his subjects, he ordered a fast to be proclaimed and observed with the greatest strictness. Not only were the people required to abstain wholly from food, but the very cattle were to be kept from all provender and water, that their mournful lowings might add to the solemnity of the awful occasion. All the inhabitants, likewise, from the least to the greatest, were commanded to wear sackcloth; nay, the very cattle that appeared in the streets were thus covered, instead of wearing their former gaudy trappings; while the inhabitants as with one voice all united in most earnest prayers to the God of Israel, to have mercy on them, and spare the city: at the same time they were required to repent, and forsake all their sins, but especially their violence, oppression, and injustice. The proclamation of approaching destruction had not been attended with any express call to repentance, or promises of mercy: yet they proceeded upon this general encouragement, from their apprehensions of the goodness of the Lord, that they could not tell but he might be induced to remit their punishment; or (speaking after the manner of men) to change his mind and repent of his purpose; his vehement anger being appeased by their submissions, humiliations, and supplications; at least this was the most probable way of escaping destruction.

V. 10. We may conclude that this fast was observed, in a very strict and solemn manner, in all parts of Nineveh; that many fervent prayers were presented to the Lord, and his name greatly honoured, and the idols disparaged; that a general reformation took place, and that numbers were converted to the true God, and his spiritual worship and service. These things the Lord observed and approved, especially their turning from their evil ways; and therefore "he repented of the evil that he had said he would "do to them." He did not execute his threatened vengeance; his warning having had its intended effect; for it was his secret purpose to manifest his readiness to forgive, to glorify his mercy, to shame the impenitence of Israel, and to give an earnest of the conversion of the Gentiles.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The sincerity of our repentance must be evinced by obedience, in those particulars especially about which we have been most rebellious: and the Lord seals the forgiveness of his offending servants, by again employing them in his honourable work. But he will not soften or alter his messages, because of any man's reluctance to deliver them, or to hear them; or because of the numbers or the power of those whom they condemn. The fear of the power and wrath of God, and the experience of his mercy, will raise us above the fear of men; and he can render the most timorous bold as lions, to proclaim his truths in the midst of his most powerful enemies. We are often needlessly afraid of men in obeying God; for he gives his word a more favourable reception than we expected; and sometimes the heathen will be more attentive than his professed worshippers. It is by faith, that sinners, when warned, are moved by fear to inquire after deliverance from the wrath to come; a small degree of light may convince men, that fasting, humiliation before God, confession of sin, prayer, and turning away from known iniquity and impiety, are probable means of escaping wrath, and obtaining, though not of meriting mercy; and kings and nobles cannot do a more essential service to the people, than in leading them, by their authority and example, to these religious exercises. But no external mortifications or devotions can be of any use, if men do not turn from the evil of their ways. If idolaters, without any express revelation of mercy, or instruction in the truths and will of God, at the call of an Israelitish prophet, upon a mere peradventure we may escape destruction, were thus earnest, fervent, prompt, self-denying, and humble in seeking mercy: how inexcuseable will professed Christians be, who, notwithstanding all the warnings, instructions, invitations, and promises of Scripture, persist in unbelief, impenitence, self-indulgence and procrastination! But if God so readily pardoned the inhabitants of this great city, where it may be apprehended the greater part were only transiently impressed and partially reformed: how readily will he pardon the broken-hearted penitent, and the believing supplicant at his mercy-seat! We may also here see the blessed effects of the resurrection of Christ, and the consequent preaching of his Gospel, in the conversion and salvation of the Gentiles; and let us pray that this preaching and these effects may pervade the whole earth.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—4. It might have been expected, that Jonah would be very humble and submissive, in consequence of his former misconduct and the merciful dealings of God with him; and that the success of his mission, in the repentance and preservation of the Ninevites, would inspire him with lively joy and gratitude: but on the contrary we find, that he was greatly displeased and very angry with God himself, for showing mercy to Nineveh; though mercy alone had preserved his life, and saved his soul from hell! In this rebellious frame he ventured to expostulate with God, and to excuse, nay, vindicate, his former disobedience! When first commanded to prophesy against Nineveh, he was aware of the event. He knew that God would mercifully spare the city, and that he should be stigmatized as a false prophet; being well acquainted with the mercy and goodness of God towards his offending creatures. And now, seeing this had turned out as he expected, he besought God to slay him and end his pain, for death was more desirable in his case than life: as if the Lord had done him an injury in delivering him from the belly of the whale! We must allow something in this case to the feelings and prejudices of the Israelites, under that dispensation: for they were too apt to despise the Gentiles, and to deem the mercy of God to them a deduction from their own privileges. Jonah might also consider Nineveh as a formidable enemy to his nation, and in that view wish for its destruction. Some think, he had a mistaken zeal for the honour of God, and thought that he would appear to have broken his word, in not executing the judgment that he had denounced. —But it is evident, that he was greatly influenced by a proud and rebellious spirit; that he considered the Ninevites as unworthy of his regard; and that he had neither expected nor desired their welfare, but had only come to denounce and witness their destruction. It is equally evident that he was not duly humbled for his own sins; and had an undue regard to his own reputation; fearing the disgrace of being thought a false prophet, and not daring to trust God to take care of his credit and safety. In this frame of mind, he overlooked the good done, and the glory of the divine goodness and mercy, as of little consequence. Yet the Lord reproved him with gentleness, and inquired whether he had cause to be thus discomposed, or did right in these peevish complaints and impatient wishes for death, when such mercy had been shown him? To which he seems to have made no answer, but to have continued sullen and fretful.

wished in himself to die, and said, It is better for me to die than to live.

9 And God said to Jonah, * Doest thou well to be angry for the gourd? And he said, [s] I † do well to be angry, [t] even unto death.

10 Then said the LORD, Thou hast ‡ had pity on the gourd, for the which thou hast not laboured, neither madest it grow; which [§] came up in a night, and perished in a night:

11 And [u] should not I spare [x] Nineveh, that great city, wherein are more than sixscore thousand persons [y] that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand; [z] and also much cattle?

V. 5—8. Doubtless Jonah might have been hospitably entertained at Nineveh, and allowed to live according to his own rules, had he been disposed to be friendly: and he might have been usefully employed in confirming the inhabitants in their good purposes, and in instructing them in the truth and worship of God. But though he had received an intimation that the city would be spared, he seems not to have believed it: and he would neither venture himself in the city, nor have any fellowship with the inhabitants; as if he meant, notwithstanding their repentance, to shake off the dust of his feet, for a testimony against them. He therefore left the city, and made a booth or tent to dwell in, till he should see the event. It pleased God, however, very graciously and miraculously to prepare a large gourd, which with rapid growth and luxuriant foliage, was speedily ready to afford him a refreshing shadow from the heat of the sun, from which it seems his tent could not defend him. This tended to appease his grief and calm his spirits; nay, he was exceedingly glad on account of this personal accommodation; whilst the repentance and preservation of a great city made him very angry and peevish! To check this disproportionate joy, and to make way for his further humiliation and instruction, the Lord caused a worm to destroy the root of the gourd, so that the next day it withered: and a sultry east-wind increasing the burning heat of the morning-sun, Jonah was so oppressed, that he fainted, grew more impatient than ever, and wished again for death as the most desirable deliverance from his misery. Some think, that he left the city, before he had seen the tokens of repentance among the inhabitants; and others, that he waited till the forty days were almost expired, when, dreading some sudden destruction, he dared not to stay any longer. It, however, seems most probable, that he both witnessed the conduct of the Ninevites, and had some intimations of the Lord's gracious purposes, before he left the city; and that he retired from it immediately after.

V. 9—11. The Lord was graciously pleased to renew his expostulations with Jonah at this crisis, and to inquire whether the withering of the gourd could warrant such anger and impatience? But he proudly and passionately justified himself, asserting that he had cause to be angry even unto death; that is, to break his heart, and to die with grief and vexation. Upon this the Lord graciously condescended to argue the matter with him. Had he pity on the gourd, or such a regard for it, merely for his own convenience and refreshment? and was he very angry when it withered; though it was not his work or property, and had cost him no labour, and though it was naturally of a swift growth and a withering nature? And was it not right, that the Lord should spare Nineveh, in which were so vast a number of his creatures, formed by his power and for the purposes of his glory? If all the inhabitants of that city, who were capable of knowing good from evil, without one exception, were deserving of the most tremendous punishment and ripe for vengeance; yet there were no less than a hundred and twenty thousand infants, incapable of knowing their right hand from their left, who were no more criminal than the offspring of others of man's fallen race: and would Jonah quarrel with his Maker for sparing the city for their sakes? There was also much cattle in the city, to which God had respect, as far more valuable than the withering gourd. And it was further implied, that among the many hundreds of thousands of grown persons in the city, there were numbers of true penitents; and the general humiliation and reformation that had been effected, rendered it peculiarly suitable for God to glorify his mercy in their preservation. Hence it might be inferred, that Jonah was deeply criminal, in being so much concerned about his own ease, comfort, and credit; and so unconcerned about the honour of God and the benefit of his creatures. We may hope, that this silenced and humbled Jonah; that he at length learned submission; and, being made to know the evil of his own heart, that he would be prepared to serve God in the prophetical office with more humility and propriety, than he had hitherto done.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—4.

Human depravity breaks out in such varied ways, as occasions are given, that it is not easy to say what a man is incapable of. Regard to his own honour, or that of his sect, or a proud contempt of others, may possibly seduce even a believer in an unguarded hour, to quarrel with the goodness of the Lord: nay malignity, in some occasional emotions, may delude a man to think it more desirable to witness or seal the ruin of others, than to be instrumental to their preservation. Indeed this is the root of all bigotry and persecution, as far as pious men have ever been betrayed into it: (Luke ix. 51—56.) Even a faithful minister may, in some possible circumstances, be tempted to impatience, by witnessing unexpected success to his own labours, in places where he had little desire of it, whilst his sanguine hopes and ardent wishes for others have been disappointed; or when his success was productive of bitter effects to his character or interests. When great good is done by those, whose conduct is so inconsistent, and so tends to prejudice men against their ministry; it must be most evident, that "the excellency of the power is of "God and not of man." Nothing but a deep knowledge of our own hearts can explain to us how it is possible for a true believer to pray in the language of rebellion and self-justification respecting things most flagrantly evil. How a man, that hath been convicted, corrected, humbled, marvellously delivered, and made thankful for such mercies, can be induced again to vindicate before God his former transgression: How a prophet could decline preaching for fear he should do good; or repent of preaching because he had been singularly successful: Or justify his fleeing from his work, because he knew that the Lord was gracious and merciful: Or mention these endearing perfections of God, to complain of them: Or how the severest discipline, and the most marvellous deliverances should fail to cure this perverseness. Yet of these things our hearts are capable, and these are but a small part of their deceitfulness and desperate wickedness. This would appear, if God should now, (as he one day will,) publish an impartial history of the secret thoughts of our hearts, in our varied experiences. It is, however, most criminal to indulge this proud and peevish spirit in our prayers: yet this too will be our case, unless we carefully watch over our passions, when under great difficulties and strong temptations. We are even capable of sincerely thanking God one day for sparing our lives, and of fretting the next because we are left to live in trouble! And we are apt to think it better for us to die than to live: not so much because heaven is more desirable than earth, or lest we should live to dishonour God; but because we are troubled by our own imaginations and corruptions; or because we are exposed to reproach and the cross, amidst our successful endeavours to glorify God and do good to mankind. In general we are most apt to desire death, when we are least fit to meet our Judge: so that the mercy of God is as much displayed in bearing with his peevish servants, as in pardoning repenting rebels; and his gentle reproofs most effectually show the evil of our discontent and impatience.

V. 5—11.

We often create ourselves uneasiness by our folly: nay, some are tempted to retire from public stations when they have the fairest opportunities of usefulness! Yet the Lord often sends gracious consolations, when we merit heavy trials, and soothes those sorrows that result from our sin and folly. The same strong ungoverned passions, that expose us to be cast down at trifling difficulties, will render us exceedingly glad of trivial advantages, and dispose us to idolize our dying comforts. These the Lord often recals, to teach us that all our gourds must wither, and that he alone is the durable Portion of his people. When we are discontented without cause, we may expect some real affliction: and the Lord sometimes seems intent with his own hand to increase our sorrows, when we are ready to faint under them, in order to humble us for our future good. But pride and anger render men incapable of perceiving the most glaring absurdities in their own conduct, and dispose them to vindicate the most daring rebellions. Our discontent, murmurs, contentions, and despondings are often about such trifles, that the cause of them needs only be mentioned, in order to their being exposed! The Lord takes from us what was never ours, and was never likely to continue with us; he sends a little pain or reproach instead of everlasting misery and contempt; and we think we do well to be angry, and even break our hearts with impatience; and speak and act, as if our grief were inconsolable and our wound incurable! Whilst we thus selfishly and in unbelief regard our own ease, interest, or credit, we proportionably disregard the glory of God, and the lives and souls of our neighbours; as if these were not worth our attention, compared with our own feelings: so contrary are we to the law of loving God supremely, and our neighbour as ourselves! And such need have we of the pardoning mercy, the atoning blood, and new-creating Spirit of our God! But his mercies are over all his works: he has a property in his creatures, and will leave none to perish, but for the honour of his justice, holiness, truth, and wisdom. He delighteth in pardoning the penitent; our infant-offspring are the objects of his tenderest regard; and even the irrational creatures share his compassion and bounty. Let us then rejoice, and be thankful for, and imitate, the mercies of our God: and whilst he condescends to expostulate with us on our selfishness; may our hearts be humbled and softened to compassion and goodwill to all men, and prepared for every service to which we are called.

BOOK OF MICAH.

THIS prophet was 'of the kingdom of Judah, as he only makes mention of kings who reigned over that 'country.—Mareshah, (14, 15,) is placed in Judah.' (Josh. xv. 44. 2 Chr. xi. 8.) (Bp. Newcombe.)—'He is called the Morasthite, from the place of his nativity, Morasthi, which St. Jerom 'distinguishes from Mareshah; though he places them both in the land of Judah.' (Lowth.)—Micah was contemporary with Isaiah, and Hosea: but it is probable that he began to prophecy later than they. The date of the third chapter, is fixed in Jeremiah to the reign of Hezekiah: but nothing further is known with certainty, concerning the time when his predictions were delivered.

He addressed his messages both to Judah and Israel: and his book, like that of the other prophets, contains sharp reproofs of sin, anful denunciations of wrath, encouraging promises and predictions of Christ, and of the establishment and prosperity of his kingdom. It is evident that Micah was acknowledged to be a prophet, and that his prophecy was well known in the time of Jeremiah. (Jer. xxvi. 18.) His authority, as a prophet, and that of his book as a part of Scripture, are twice appealed to in the New Testament, in respect of the place where the Messiah should be born. (Matt. ii. 5. John vii. 42.) Our Lord uses nearly his words, concerning the persecutions, to which his disciples would be exposed. (Com. vii. 6. with Matt. x. 35, 36:) and many of his predictions have received an undeniable accomplishment. (Notes, iii. 8—12. iv. 2—4. v. 2—6;) though others are not yet fulfilled. His style hath been much admired by the best judges: though it is occasionally obscure, through conciseness and sudden transitions from one subject to another.

sins, in such a manner, that you cannot be able to deny the charge.' (Lowth.) The two nations, (or peoples,) namely, Judah and Israel, yea, the whole land of Canaan and all its fulness, were summoned to appear before God, who, from his holy temple in heaven, (of which the temple on mount Zion was but a shadow,) would be both Witness to detect their guilt, and Judge to denounce sentence against them. He was about to leave his place: (his mercy-seat, or his glorious throne above,) to come down and enter into judgment with them: then would he tread upon and level the high places of the earth, or reduce the power and pride of the mightiest princes: the very mountains would melt like wax under him; and the valleys would be rent with chasms, such as are made by impetuous torrents when poured down from a steep place; that is, all ranks of men would be reduced to the utmost confusion and misery. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5—7. Samaria was the great source of wickedness to Israel, and Jerusalem to Judah; from whence idolatry and iniquity, sanctioned by authority and example, were diffused through the land. Therefore, Samaria would first be visited, as a warning to Jerusalem; and it would be reduced to a heap of rubbish and stones, such as were seen collected in vineyards, when the ground was prepared for planting the vines. For the stones of their sumptuous edifices would be poured down into the adjacent valley, and the city razed even to the foundations: their graven images would be seized or destroyed by the conquerors, with all their consecrated treasures; and that idolatrous worship would be abolished: these riches had been collected as infamously, as a harlot obtains her hire, and they should be wasted and spoiled in a manner equally disgraceful.

V. 8, 9. The prophet expressed his deep concern for the calamities that he predicted, by representing himself ready to appear as one frantic with grief; and not only weeping and howling for anguish of spirit, but stripping himself and going naked, as an emblem of their captivity and slavery; (Marg. Ref.) and as making a most doleful noise, like that of dragons or owls. For Samaria's wound would be quite incurable; and the Assyrians, having destroyed the kingdom of Israel, would invade Judah, and march even to the gates of Jerusalem. This they afterwards did under the conduct of Sennacherib.—The word rendered dragons, frequently signifies sea-monsters; but here a land-animal seems to be intended. 'The 'word may signify a kind of wild beast like a dog, be-'tween a dog and a fox, or a wolf and a dog, (our 'English travellers call them Jakalls;) which abiding in 'the fields and waste places, make in the night a lament-'able howling noise.' Owls or ostriches. 'During the 'lonesome part of the night, they often make a very 'doleful and hideous noise. I have often heard them, as 'if they were in the greatest agonies, an action, beautifully 'alluded to by the prophet Micah.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 10—16. The prophet seems here to have had in prospect both the ruin of Samaria and the desolations of Israel by Shalmanesar, and the invasion of Judah by Sennacherib, kings of Assyria. These successes, of idolaters against JEHOVAH's worshippers, ought not to be declared at Gath, lest the Philistines should rejoice; (2 Sam. i. 20.) In their presence the Israelites ought not to weep at all. 'The word Aphrah signifies dust: and the prophet, it is 'likely, puts it here for Ophrah, in the tribe of Benjamin, '(Josh. xviii. 23.) that the name may better suit their 'condition.' In the distressed cities or towns of Israel and Judah, the inhabitants would be called to roll themselves in the dust. Saphir signifies fair or beautiful; (some think Samaria was intended:) but its inhabitants would be stripped of their comely ornaments, torn from their habitations, and led away as naked slaves. Zaanan, (Josh. xv. 37.) Zaanan signifies a place of flocks; Bethezel, a house that is near: the inhabitants of the former would not go forth to assist the latter under their distresses; but the enemy would soon fix his station among them, and they would share the fate of their neighbours, and the invaders would obtain a large compensation for their encamping before the city. Maroth signifies bitterness, (Josh. xv. 59. Maarath,) but some think that Ramoth was meant, which signifies exaltations. The inhabitants carefully looked out for and expected better tidings or better times: but evil came from the Lord upon them, and even proceeded to the gates of Jerusalem. Lachish was a city of Judah, but it bordered on Israel; and having learned their idolatries, it communicated them to the inhabitants of other cities, and even to those of Jerusalem: therefore the city would certainly be taken and plundered by the Assyrians; and the inhabitants would be glad to flee away in chariots drawn by horses, dromedaries, or the fleetest animals: and they would give presents to Moresheth-gath, some town belonging to the Philistines, to shelter them from the invaders. —Achzib signifies a lie; and thus that city would deceive the expectation of the kings of Israel. The Lord would also bring the Assyrians, or their colonies, to be the heirs of Mareshah, which signifies an heir, or an inheritance: and they would also seize upon Adullam, and mar all the glory of Israel, 'The honourable men shall be forced to 'hide themselves in the cave of Adullam, as David did 'when he fled from Saul.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)—The nation might therefore prepare, (as a mother,) to show every token of distress and mourning over her children, brought up delicately and greatly delighted in, (casting off her ornaments, and cutting off her hair as the eagle moults its feathers;) for they would all in a short time be carried into captivity.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They who would escape the Lord's indignation, must hearken diligently to the reproofs and warnings, as well as the doctrines and encouragements, of the sacred oracles.—The Lord will bear witness against, as well as denounce judgment upon, the workers of wickedness; and his holy temple will not protect hypocrites, but enhance their condemnation. When he comes forth from his place to execute judgment, the haughty and powerful of the earth will tremble and fall before him: for how can sinners endure that presence, before which the elements shall melt and the whole creation shall vanish away? But our transgressions alone render his presence terrible to us: and if sin be pardoned and subdued we have nothing to fear, at death or in the day of judgment. Capital cities and great men too often give examples of impiety and iniquity, which flow from them throughout whole kingdoms, and infect all the lower orders in society; and the judgments of God will follow in the same channels, and in the same proportion: for ringleaders in wickedness must expect to have the first or largest measure of punishment; and that wealth, which is obtained by vice, will be spent or lost with disgrace and misery. But we should lament the distresses, that we foresee coming upon the ungodly: and tears seem far more congenial to our condition in this world than laughter. No hand can cure the wounds that the Lord inflicts, except his own: we may hope, wait, and seek for good, but evil must come upon us, unless he be reconciled to us: all other refuges but Christ must be lies to those who trust in them: other heirs will succeed to every inheritance, except that of heaven; and all glory will be turned into shame, if not connected with the honour that cometh from God only. Sinners may now selfishly disregard the sufferings of their neighbours; yet their turn will soon come. But it is most grievous, when the sins and sorrows of the Church are so notorious, as to rejoice the hearts, or embolden the blasphemies, of her avowed enemies.

V. 2, 3. 'As they devise mischief against others; so will I devise evil against them. As they have unjustly deprived others of their inheritance; so shall a conquering enemy dispossess them, and carry them into captivity. —The word family is equivalent to people.' (Lowth.)

V. 4, 5. The Lord, by the Assyrians and Chaldeans, would make the whole house of Israel lament, that their portion was changed from prosperity in the promised land, to captivity in that of their enemies. He would wonderfully remove their inheritance from them, and, turning away in anger, he would divide their fields to others: nor should there be any appointed, to assign them by lot a portion of land amongst the congregation of the Lord, as had been the case in the days of Joshua, and in the years of jubilee: for they would be totally disinherited and excluded from their peculiar privileges.

V. 6, 7. The rulers and people endeavoured to silence the true prophets, that they might no more hear their offensive and alarming predictions: and therefore the Lord would deprive them of that invaluable advantage; and let none prophesy to them to put them to shame or bring them to repentance. But did it behoove those, that were called by the name of Jacob, to act as if the Spirit of God might be limited in his operations, and constrained to inspire only such things as pleased them? Were these the doings of Jacob? Were these such actions as God would approve? Or were the severe messages of the prophets the Lord's doings, when the sins of the people alone had rendered them necessary? And would they not be useful to them if they uprightly desired to know and do the will of God? And did not all his words, whether they alarmed, humbled, instructed, reproved, or encouraged the people, conduce to the real benefit of all who were upright in heart?

V. 8—10. The people, who were called God's worshippers, had of late, more than ever before, risen against him and his servants as enemies: they had robbed and plundered the inoffensive and the helpless: they had forcibly dispossessed the women from their pleasant habitations: and had sold their children for slaves, depriving them finally of their liberty, country, religion, and all the privileges which God had bestowed on Israel to be their glory. The Lord in anger therefore commanded them to arise, and get out of the land into captivity. It should no longer be their rest and quiet habitation, seeing it was polluted by their idolatry and iniquity: but it should rather be to them a place of execution, where they would be destroyed in a most tremendous manner. Many suppose that the ravages committed by Pekah, when Israel made tremendous destruction in Judah, is referred to, as one cause of Israel's ruin.

V. 11. A man, habitually influenced by the spirit of lies, who, for the sake of wine and sensual indulgence, would encourage the people to hope for impunity in sin, and abundance of every thing requisite for the gratification of their passions; who would be more welcome to them, and more congenial to their sentiments and conduct, than the holy servants of God were: and therefore they would be left to be deceived by such prophets.

fore them, and the LORD on the head of them.

CHAP. III.

Micah reproves the princes for their cruelty, and the prophets for their falsehoods and selfishness, 1—7. He declares himself inspired and authorized by the Spirit of God to protest against the sins and presumption of the princes, priests, and prophets; and to denounce the desolations of the city and temple, 8—12.

AND I said, [a] Hear, I pray you, O heads of Jacob, and ye princes of the house of Israel; [b] Is it not for you to know judgment?

V. 12, 13. Many expositors interpret these verses, according to the context, as a prediction of the captivity of Israel and Judah. After great numbers had perished, the remnant of them would be assembled, as a flock of sheep in Bozrah into the midst of the fold, to be thence taken out for the slaughter; and the multitude of them, or that of their enemies, would make a great noise and confusion. The Assyrian or Chaldean commander would march before the army, to break his way into the city: and after the walls had been destroyed, the gates would be opened, by which they would go forth with their spoil and prisoners, with the king of the victorious army before them; and the Lord himself at the head of them, prospering their undertakings and using them as his executioners: and indeed this seems the most obvious interpretation. Yet very respectable expositors understand the passage as a prophecy of the conversion of the Jews and Israelites to Christ. The Lord would not only bring back the remnant of the nation from Babylon, multiply them as a flock of sheep, and turn their mourning into joyful acclamations; but he would in due time bring them into the Christian Church as the sheep of his pasture. The Lord Jesus, in the character of The Breaker, would open their way through all obstacles, into a state of communion with God, and happiness in his favour: he would break through all hinderances, by his miraculous incarnation, his obedience and sufferings, resurrection, ascension, and intercession; by leading captivity captive, and opening the gates of heaven to all believers: and by the work of his Spirit in their hearts, breaking off the fetters of sin and Satan. Thus he hath gone before, and his people follow, breaking, in his strength, through the hosts of their enemies, that obstruct their way to heaven. Their King hath passed before them, and the Lord is at their head, and he leads them forward to share his victories and triumphs, till they enter the same everlasting mansions, and death the last enemy be destroyed. The conversion and restoration of the Jews, according to this interpretation, are especially foretold.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The more deliberately wickedness is contrived and committed, the greater guilt is contracted: and men must give an account of all that passes in their hearts, on their beds, and in their most secret retirements. Yet many think every thing allowable that is practicable, and which for the present may be done with impunity; regardless of the wo that God hath denounced against such successful plunderers! The unwearied diligence of wicked men in their sinful pursuits, should shame us out of our indolence in the service of God. When covetousness occupies the heart, violence or fraud will commonly employ the hands: and whilst men thus oppress whole families, and rob even their remote posterity of their heritage, to enrich themselves; they forget, that the almighty God devises evil against them, from which they will find no possible way of escape; and that an evil time is coming, when they shall no more behave themselves with haughtiness and insolence. Then their joyful congratulations will be turned into doleful lamentations, that they are utterly spoiled, driven from their earthly portion, and excluded for ever from all share in the inheritance of the congregation of the Lord. No wonder such men hate the faithful messengers of God, who would put them to shame for their sins: they have only the name of Christians, or they would not think to modify the language of the Holy Spirit by human authority, to silence those whom God commands to speak, or to teach his ministers to accommodate their doctrine to humour their lusts. These are not the doings of true Israelites, who are without guile, and who love and profit by all the words of God. Such nominal Christians are in fact the worst enemies of God and his Church, and often join persecution of his people with oppression of the widow and the orphan: and their polluted privileges will soon be taken from them and turn to their destruction. Teachers who will recommend self-indulgence by their doctrine and example, best suit them; and they will generally be given up to such deceivers. But Christ's sheep hear his voice and follow him: he gathers them into his fold and feeds them in his pasture; and an innumerable multitude are already collected, who are before the throne joyfully ascribing salvation to God and to the Lamb that was slain. As he hath rent the veil, and opened our way to the throne of grace; as he hath burst the grave and opened the gates of heaven, and entered as our Forerunner: let us depend on him, and follow him, and so break through the maxims and customs of the world, the opposition of sin and Satan, and all the difficulties in our way to glory. And when we are called to arise, and depart out of this polluted world to our rest in heaven, we need fear no evil in passing through death and the grave; for he will be with us, and bring us both in soul and body to his holy habitation.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—4. The rulers of Israel might be intended by this address, a well as those of Judah; yet the latter seems to be chiefly meant. They had every opportunity of knowing the rules of justice and equity, and it was peculiarly incumbent on them to understand and practise them; yet they carelessly, nay, wilfully, continued ignorant of them, or decided causes and enacted laws in opposition to them. They evidently hated every thing good and all pious men; and loved wickedness, and the wicked, by whom they could serve their own base purposes. Instead of feeding and protecting the Lord's flock, they fleeced, butchered, and devoured them; reducing the poor people to the deepest misery by their cruel exactions and oppressions. They would therefore shortly cry out under the oppressions of their enemies or other great distresses; but the Lord would utterly disregard them, according to their behaviour to him and their poor brethren. The marginal references will show those who examine them, that these verses are also peculiarly descriptive of the character and conduct of the Jewish scribes, priests, and rulers, in the days of Christ and his apostles; and perhaps predict the subsequent condition of that people.

V. 5—7. The false prophets likewise were highly criminal; and indeed the cause of the general wickedness of the nation. They flattered the people into a delusive expectation of peace in their evil ways: yet they were ready to bite and devour such as opposed them, and even to declare war against those who would not satisfy their avarice and rapacity, being "greedy dogs, that could never "have enough;" so that their peaceable and soft language was restricted to their prophesyings before those who paid well for them. Therefore the approaching distresses should confute their prognostications, and prevent them from pretending to any more visions. The sun of their prosperity, reputation, and hope, would suddenly be darkened, and leave them in misery, contempt, and despair. God would shame and silence all such seers and diviners; and they should cover their lips as mourners or unclean persons; confessing that they could obtain no answer from God to their anxious inquiries concerning the end of their calamities. (Marg. Ref.) How exactly does this describe the state of that once favoured nation, for above the last seventeen hundred years?

V. 8—12. It is probable that Micah was greatly opposed by the wicked princes and false prophets: but he knew and confidently declared, that he spake by the authority of God and the inspiration of his Spirit: that he was abundantly endued with honesty, wisdom, and energy, to deliver his faithful message, whether they would hear it or not; and that he was especially commissioned to declare unto his people the number and heinousness of their sins. He therefore entreated the rulers of the people to attend, and not to persist in fighting against God. They had indeed abhorred all justice and perverted equity; they had beautified the city with magnificent houses, and fortified it with walls, and perhaps repaired, or added buildings to, the temple; but it was done with money that had been the wages of murder and oppression. The magistrates, priests, and prophets, were alike mercenary and avaricious: yet they presumed upon their external privileges, the temple of God, and their formal worship: so that when they were warned of approaching judgments, they inquired whether the LORD were not among them, and were confident no evil would befal them. To punish therefore their hypocrisy and iniquity, the city would certainly be desolated, and become heaps of rubbish; and the mountain where the temple stood would be rendered as waste and unfrequented as the forests and deserts. This prophecy was delivered in the reign of Hezekiah, and probably in the beginning of it, (Note, Jer. xxvi. 16—19.) The princes, priests, and prophets, in general either discountenanced his zeal for reformation, or concurred in a hypocritical manner; but the king was decided, and these predictions seem to have encouraged and quickened his endeavours, and to have stirred up more persons to concur with him: by which means the judgments were retarded, but not averted. The destruction of the city and temple by the Romans, (as well as that by the Chaldeans,) seems to have been predicted; in which the ground, where the temple stood, is said to have been broken up with a plow by the conquerors. (Marg. Ref.) The avowed counsel of Caiaphas to put our Lord to death, without alleging any charge against him, that the nation might not perish, was a remarkable instance of that carnal policy, by which princes and priests have attempted to build Zion with blood, even the blood of the prophets, apostles, and ministers of God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Princes and magistrates are more concerned to know judgment than other men, as their conduct has more important and extensive effects; and princes in Israel have abundant opportunity of knowing it. Yet, through human depravity and the temptations peculiar to their situation, they are often ignorant of the rules by which they ought to govern, judge, or act: and sometimes they most evidently prove, that they hate the good and love the evil, by their iniquitous exactions and oppressions. Thus thousands are made miserable, to humour the caprice, to maintain the luxury and ostentation, or to gratify the ambition or avarice of one cruel tyrant? But let not such men expect to be heard or favoured by God, when they shall cry unto him in extreme distress; for "they shall have judgment without mercy, who have showed no mercy." Alas! such wholesome truths can seldom reach their ears, who are environed with flatterers or teachers of lies, whom they reward with a share of their plunder and riot. Such are smooth in their doctrine, soft in their manners, and courtly in their address: but they can snarl and bite too, if their inferiors offend them; and contend furiously and maliciously with those that refuse to satisfy their mercenary demands. And though they are dumb dogs, that cannot bark in the cause of God, yet they open their mouths wide, to brawl and to devour. But the light that is in them is darkness: their prosperity and honour will soon end in misery and disgrace, and their sanguine hope in black despair: they will be ashamed of their lying divinations and erroneous doctrines, by which they have fatally misled the people; and they shall have no answer from God in the time of their distress. On the other hand, he who preaches by the authority and according to the oracles of God, from zeal for his glory and love to the souls of men; who is conscious of integrity and assured of the truth of his doctrine; may speak with constancy and confidence, in the midst of calumny and opposition; though he should be called upon to expose the transgressions of princes and priests who abhor judgment, and prostitute their important offices to the gratification of their vile avarice, ambition, malice, or sensuality. For even such men may be so blinded as to have a presumptuous confidence in God, and expect security in sin, because of their abused privileges and hypocritical profession: but they must be told that they are in the way of destruction; and it should be known by all, that rulers and teachers of this description are the causes of ruin to churches and nations, and answerable for all the calamities which for their sakes come upon them.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. (Notes, &c. Is. ii. 1—5.) The connexion of this prophecy, (which hath already been explained,) with the close of the foregoing chapter, shows, that the establishment of the Christian Church, in consequence of the abrogation of the Mosaic dispensation, and the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, were predicted. But though it hath in a measure been fulfilling ever since those events, yet its great accomplishment must be future: for the Scripture cannot be broken; and the nations have not yet so submitted to the Prince of peace, as to beat their swords into plow-shares, &c.

4 But [l] they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig-tree; [m] and none shall make them afraid: [n] for the mouth of the LORD of hosts hath spoken it.

V. 4. This beautiful addition to the prophecy, as it stands in Isaiah, denotes the sweet harmony which in those happy days shall prevail among Christians, in communing with God and with each other; their perfect security, and peaceful industry; their thankful and comfortable use of temporal plenty, and the abundance of their spiritual consolations. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. The Gentiles were tenacious of the religion of their ancestors, and took pleasure in worshipping their imaginary deities: whilst Israel had always been disposed to grow weary of the worship of God, and to relapse into idolatry. But in the predicted period the true Israel will cleave to the Lord with purpose of heart, and delight greatly in worshipping his name and doing his will, with constancy and perseverance. This is, in some measure, the desire, purpose, and conduct of true believers in every age: God is their Portion, and his service will be their happiness for ever and ever. 'This will be remarkably 'fulfilled at the general conversion of the Jews, when this 'prophecy shall receive its utmost completion.' (Lowth.)

V. 6, 7. The collecting of the enfeebled and dispersed Jewish captives, from Babylon to Jerusalem, (as sheep that had been lamed, or driven away by robbers;) and their subsequent increase into a considerable remnant, and then into a strong nation, under the government of the Lord, formed but a faint shadow of the rapid increase of the Christian Church, amidst all her persecutions and afflictions, in the first age after Christ: and this was but an earnest of the healing, purifying, increasing, and prospering of the Church, which we wait for; when the kingdom of the Lord shall be conspicuously set up, the Jews shall be re-admitted into the Church, and the Gentiles converted: and this reign of Christ shall continue, till it is succeeded by the everlasting kingdom of heaven.—'Though I have broken the power of my people, removed 'them into captivity far off, and afflicted them; yet will I 'restore them to their country, I will send them the Mes- 'siah, and will always be their King. For ever. This 'will be fulfilled at the future restoration of the Jews.'—(Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 8—10. Mount Zion was the tower of the Lord's flock under the old dispensation, the centre of their union, and the special residence of their Protector; and the temple was its strong-hold. Thither Christ the good Shepherd and the Ruler of his people came, and there first he set up his kingdom. This kingdom would be like the first dominion of Israel in the days of David and Solomon; and would surpass and supersede all other monarchies. The Son of David would come to Jerusalem and establish his kingdom, and thence its influence would extend to other nations. And though that city would soon after be destroyed, yet the evangelical Church, the spiritual Zion, would succeed to it; in which Christ reigns for the benefit of his people, and his cause must prevail even to the end of the world. Indeed, the calamities to be endured by Zion from the Assyrian invasion, and during the Chaldean ravages, and the taking and destruction of the city, (which were typical of the subsequent calamities of the Jewish nation and of the Church;) would cause her to cry aloud as a woman in her pangs; and as if there were no king to protect, or counsellor to direct her. But why did she yield to disconsolate sorrow? Let her remember, that her pains were those of travail, not the agonies of death, that she might have hope under them, and know how to exert herself for deliverance. She would certainly be driven out of the city, and dwell as in an open field, and even be dragged to Babylon as a captive; yet that crisis would make way for her happy restoration and for better times, when the Lord would redeem her from the hand of her enemies. This event shadowed forth the recovery of the Jews from their present dispersions, and the deliverance of the Christian Church from antichristian tyranny.

V. 11—13. Many nations would be collected against Zion, to pollute her by their idolatries, or forward and exult in her calamities. But they would not understand that the Lord collected them, as sheaves of corn are gathered upon the floor to be threshed: and Zion, weak and dispirited as she was, should be strengthened, as with horns of iron and hoofs of brass, to trample them down and beat them in pieces: and being enriched by their plunder, she would consecrate her gain to the Lord of the whole earth, by whose assistance these victories would be obtained. There occurs nothing in the history of the Jewish church, that fully accords to this prediction. Sennacherib's army was not destroyed by the Jews; nor had they any hand in the subversion of the Babylonish monarchy. The victories of the Maccabees over Antiochus might be a partial accomplishment of it; and so might that of the Christian Church over the power of her persecutors, after the conversion of Constantine. But the grand accomplishment is yet in futurity. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Whilst we wait for those last days, in which the kingdom of Christ shall be exalted above all other dominions, and extended over all nations; let us be thankful for our privileges, and excite ourselves and each other to frequent the ordinances of our God; that we may learn, and walk in his holy ways, receiving the law from his hands, that, being written in our hearts by his Spirit, it may evidence our interest in the righteousness of the great Redeemer. Let us also endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, and to live peaceably with all men: that whilst the nations of the earth still continue to learn and practise war, and numbers delight in discord and confusion, it may appear by our conduct, that harmony, equity, truth, and love, are genuine effects of faith in Christ, and of his Gospel, when truly obeyed. Even in this world of contention and violence, if we have peace with God, and with our consciences and our brethren, we may rest securely under the divine protection, and fear no enemy: we may rejoice in our privileges, and walk in the name of our God, with grateful praises and unabated alacrity and vigour: and we should cleave to him with more constancy, than the men of this world do to their idolized possessions and pleasures. Even the weak in faith, and those who have been wounded and made to halt, in their conflicts with temptation, or have been cast out by their brethren, or driven away by persecution, or weighed down by affliction, may yet hope in the Lord. When they look to him, he will gather, strengthen, and heal them, and take care of them, as their King and Protector: even as he will render his enfeebled oppressed Church a strong nation, and superior to all enemies or competitors. In his glory his people shall be glorious, and the feeblest believer shall rejoice in the joy of his inheritance: and all the afflictions of the Church and of the believer, are sure to end happily. We should then cry aloud with the prayer of faith, not with the voice of despondency, under our distresses. We have an omnipotent King to rule over us, and an all-wise Counsellor to advise us: his promises engage that the crisis of extreme sorrow shall introduce that most joyful deliverance, to all who love and obey him; for he will redeem them from all their enemies. But they who unite against Zion, to pollute or triumph over her, are ignorant of these intentions and counsels of our God, and are not aware that they are compassing their own destruction, and that they are only collecting together to be destroyed. As the strength and victory of believers are wholly from the Lord, they can do no less than ascribe all the glory to his name, and consecrate all their powers, advantages, and possessions to his service. Let us thus gird on our armour, and arise to fight the good fight of faith: and amidst our conflicts let us rejoice in hope of being made more than conquerors, and anticipate the songs of heaven; and dedicating all our talents to his service, let us seek and pray, that as the Redeemer of sinners, and the Object of all love and worship to his ransomed people, he may become the Lord of the whole earth.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1. The victory of Zion over her enemies having been predicted in the close of the preceding chapter, they are here challenged to collect their forces for the assault. Either Nineveh or Babylon seems to be meant by "the daughter of troops," as their prosperity arose from success in war, and they were renowned for valiant soldiers. The king of Assyria besieged Samaria, and he or his captains insulted Hosea, the judge or king of Israel, with all indignities; as the victorious king of Babylon did Zedekiah, when he had besieged and taken Jerusalem. Some have thought, that the outrageous conduct of Sennacherib and Rabshakeh to Hezekiah was meant: but Sennacherib did not lay siege to Jerusalem, nor was Hezekiah ever in his power. Many, however, suppose, that Rome was intended by "the daughter of troops;" and that the Romans were called upon to collect their armies to besiege Jerusalem, because the Jews had thus insulted and despised Christ, the Judge of Israel: (Matt. xxvi. 67, 68.)

V. 2. The house of David would be reduced very low; yet the city of David would certainly be honoured by the nativity of the Messiah. Ephratah distinguishes Bethlehem in Judah from another place of the same name, in a different part of the land, (Josh. xix. 15, 16:) and therefore Matthew here quotes the passage according to the meaning, not verbally; "And thou Bethlehem in the land of Ju-"dah." This city had been reduced to be small amongst the flourishing cities of that numerous tribe, and its many thousands under their princes: yet the birth of Christ would so dignify it, that it would by no means be the least honourable of them, (Note, Matt. ii 4—6:) for he would come forth thence to be Ruler in Israel, upon the throne of David, for evermore. Or the clause may be read interrogatively, "Art thou little among the thousands of Ju-"dah?" The words, "unto me," may either refer to the Lord; and then they mean, that the birth of Christ was intended for the glory of the Father: or to the Church, as represented by the prophet; and then they signify, that the Son of God became incarnate for the salvation of his people. "His goings forth had been from of old, from "everlasting." This denotes his eternal co-existence with the Father as the only begotten Son; and his eternal appointment in the counsel and decrees of God to his mediatory work, and to his incarnation, as connected with it.

Whose goings, &c. 'The words do naturally import an 'original, distinct from the birth of Christ,—which is here 'declared to have been from eternity: for so the word, 'translated here from of old, but rendered from everlast-'ing, (Hab. i. 12.) and the words rendered "from the 'days of eternity," (Marg.) do plainly signify.' (Lowth.) Indeed, if we suppose that Micah purposed to state, in as energetic language as possible, the pre-existence from eternity of him who in the fulness of time would be born at Bethlehem, we cannot easily find out words in which he could have more forcibly expressed his meaning.

V. 3, 4. Nevertheless, (as the word therefore may be translated,) the Jews for their sins would be given up to be harassed by the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Syrians, and Romans, until the time when the virgin, that was to travail with child, should bring forth this great Deliverer. Then the chosen remnant of the Jews would be restored to the privileges of true Israelites: or the chosen remnant of the Gentiles would be converted, and united as brethren with the believers of Israel, to be one fold under one Shepherd: and he, uniting tenderness and power, would govern, guard, and provide for his Church of harmless, defenceless, and persecuted disciples, "in the Majesty of the name "of the LORD his God:" exercising the perfections, performing the works, and displaying the glories of God, through his human nature. Under his rule, the Church would abide in safety, and be preserved as lambs in the midst of wolves; and at length he would be renowned, obeyed, and trusted, even to the ends of the earth. 'God 'will not fully vindicate and exalt his people, till the 'virgin-mother shall have brought forth her Son; and till 'Judah and Israel, and all the true sons of Abraham among 'their brethren the Gentiles, be converted to christianity.' "He shall stand," 'the Ruler mentioned in the second 'verse.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 5, 6. This promised Saviour and Salvation would ensure to Judah peace or deliverance, during the ravages of the Assyrians and other enemies. But as Sennacherib's invasion was not repelled by the rulers or chieftains of Israel; nor did the Jews ever invade or waste the Assyrian dominions, or those of the Chaldeans who afterwards occupied the same regions; it seems evident, that these expressions must be understood as mystically intending other enemies and persecutors of the Church, that should be of the same spirit with Sennacherib and the Assyrians. Whatever heathen, infidel, or antichristian opposer should at any time harass, or attempt to desolate the Church, as Sennacherib did Judah and Jerusalem, the great Shepherd of the flock would furnish a competent number of able teachers and rulers, to defeat their designs, and at length to retaliate upon them, and to destroy those that had attempted to destroy them. This may refer to the powerful effects of the preached Gospel in the primitive times in subverting Paganism; to the termination of Pagan persecution by the conversion of the Roman emperors; and to the future promulgation of the Gospel, and the ruin of all Antichristian, Pagan, and Mahometan powers, by the numerous and able instruments that the Lord will raise up for these purposes.

V. 7—9. The remnant of Israel, that was converted to Christ in the primitive times, namely, the apostles, evangelists, and first teachers and professors of the Gospel, were scattered among many nations, as the drops of dew or the showers of rain on the earth, which cause the grass to grow in those places where no human culture is employed, and without waiting for the help of man. Thus they went into the cities and villages of the Gentiles, not as sent for by them, or commissioned by human authority, or depending on the power or wisdom of man; but as immediately employed, qualified, and prospered by God: and by their doctrine, prayers, and example, they were the instruments of rendering those barren deserts fruitful in a large increase of spiritual worshippers, and holy servants of God our Saviour. No doubt the converted Jews will hereafter exhibit a still more striking completion of this prophecy. But to those who neglected and opposed this salvation, these same persons would be terrible and destructive as lions among the beasts of the forest, or even amongst the flocks of helpless sheep. For their doctrine would condemn them: and the Lord concurring, by his providence, would cut off all their enemies. The destruction of the enemies of the Jews, after their future restoration to their own land, seems to be here predicted, (Marg. Ref.) 'The former verse described the benefits 'the converted Jews should bring to those Gentiles who 'were disposed to embrace the Gospel: this (8) instructs 'us how terrible adversaries they will prove to them 'who persist in their enmity to them and to the truth.' (Lowth.)

V. 10—15. In those happy times, the Lord promised to wean the people from all confidence in chariots, horses, cities, and strong-holds; even as though they had been entirely destroyed: and to purge out all sorcery, witchcraft, and idolatry, and the relics of those abominations from among them: and having done this, he would destroy their enemies, (so the word translated cities may be rendered;) and "execute vengeance, in anger and in fury, on the "nations which have not hearkened unto me." (Bp. Newcombe.) The reformation of the Jews after their return from Babylon might be alluded to; but the purification of the Christian Church from all antichristian corruptions of faith and worship, and all idolatry and superstition, seem more immediately to be predicted. The reliance on human merits for justification; the external pomp used in worship; and the oppressive exercise of human authority in mere matters of conscience, will be entirely destroyed by the clear light of divine truth and the power of divine grace; and simplicity and purity in doctrine, worship, and practice, will prevail, when the enemies of the Church shall be destroyed.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They who delight or excel in war often gather themselves against the Church of God: and sometimes they treat the most honourable and excellent of the saints, as the Judge of Israel and of the earth was treated in the days of his humiliation: but they cannot prevail against the cause that God upholds, nor prevent the accomplishment of his decrees. We should not then be impatient, or despond under any contumely or cruelty, which we meet with for his sake. We should look steadfastly to the divine glory of the Redeemer, "whose goings forth have been from of "old, from everlasting;" and upon his condescending love to sinners, when he humbled himself to appear in our nature, and to become poor and a sufferer, that he might be our Prince and Saviour, and that by ruling over us he might confer the most invaluable blessings. A relation to him ennobles the meanest and enriches the poorest; and surely we shall not refuse to obey him, who hath a right to our services, purchased by his unspeakable sufferings for us, and immense obligations conferred on us! Great have been the effects of his redemption; yet his Church hath been left to struggle with various difficulties, and will continue to be so till the arrival of that great deliverance, for which she travaileth and is in pain to this hour, when Jews and Gentiles shall, all over the earth, meet as brethren in Christ Jesus. In the mean time let us trust to our Shepherd's care and power: he standeth as one intent upon his work, and feedeth his purchased flock with divine condescension, majesty, and authority; his very looks appal the wolves that would devour his harmless sheep, and they abide unhurt amidst their powerful and enraged enemies. How great and glorious ought his name to be throughout the earth! He is our peace, and having reconciled us to God by his blood, he giveth us inward peace in our outward tribulations. If he permit the assaults of our enemies, he will supply helpers and assistance sufficient for us; and all the power of every enemy shall fall before those shepherds and principal persons, whom he employs to maintain and propagate his truth and cause. As he employed the converted Jews, like dew and rain, to fructify the Gentile nations, so should we endeavour to be in our several places in his Church and in the world; aiming to glorify God, and expecting the blessing from him, and not waiting for men's solicitation to attempt their good, nor growing weary through their ingratitude. Yet the most beneficent, zealous, and useful Christians and ministers will prove the occasions of the deepest condemnation to obstinate unbelievers and enemies: and as their ruin will be attended with the purification of the Church from every error and defilement; so we shall be assured of victory in our personal conflicts, in proportion as we simply depend upon the Lord our salvation, worship him spiritually, and serve him with devoted diligence in all his ordinances and commandments.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1, 2. After having delivered the foregoing evangelical predictions, the prophet was again employed to reprove the sins of the people. He called upon them to hear the word of God: for he had ordered him to arise, and with great boldness and earnestness to contend with them, in God's behalf, before the mountains and hills; that even these strong foundations of the earth might hear his controversy with Israel, and his pleading against them; and so witness and declare his righteousness in the punishments inflicted on them. 'He taketh 'the high mountains and hard rocks to witness against the 'obstinacy of his people.' The most mighty monarchs, the most renowned sages, or most powerful nations of the earth, might thus be figuratively appealed to.

V. 3—5. The people were called upon to declare what had aggrieved them, that they were become weary of God's worship, and prone to idolatry. Had he ever oppressed them with burdensome or unreasonable services? Or had he refused to supply their wants and protect them? If they had any thing to urge against his commandments, institutions, or dispensations, let them testify against him. Having redeemed them from slavery in Egypt, he had placed Moses, Aaron, and Miriam over them, to rule and teach them, and help them in the exercises of their religion. Nor ought they to forget the consultations of Balak and Balaam, about cursing and prevailing against them; and how the Lord constrained Balaam to bless them altogether, in every place from whence he viewed them; and how he prevented the more fatal effects of his last diabolical device against them, and turned it against Balaam, Balak, and the Moabites. (Marg. Ref.) Thence they might learn the equity, faithfulness, and kindness of the Lord towards them, and the righteousness of his present dealings with them; for this was a specimen of his continual protection, for which they were inexcusably ungrateful. Shittim was in the plains of Moab, Gilgal lay west of Jordan, all the favours shown to Israel, from Balaam's attempt to curse them till they were encamped in the promised land, are here referred to. "Righteousness." 'We may often ob-'serve, that the original word includes the notion of mer-'cy.' (Bp Newcombe.) When that to which sinners had no claim is mercifully promised, the righteousness of God is concerned in fulfilling that promise.

V. 6—8. Some eminent expositors understand these verses as the substance of Balak's consultation with Balaam, concerning the method of obtaining the favour of Israel's God, that he might give them leave to curse his people; and of Balaam's answer, recommending to him justice, mercy, and a humble walk with God. But this does not at all agree with the history of those transactions; for Balaam seems, from first to last, to have recommended to Balak nothing but numerous and costly sacrifices; and, when these failed, he counselled him to draw the Israelites into fornication and idolatry: and to suppose, that on some other occasion, not mentioned in the history, he gave Balak counsel, not only dissimilar to this, but directly contrary to the character and plan of all the parties concerned, is surely most unnatural and unreasonable. The words rather contain the supposed inquiries of the alarmed but ignorant Jews or Israelites, who heard of the Lord's controversy with them. They were afraid of his vengeance, and perceived the necessity of coming and bowing down before him, as the most high God; but they did not understand how to seek acceptance with him. The burnt-offerings and sin-offerings, prescribed by the law, might perhaps be deemed insufficient; but would he be pleased with more numerous and costly oblations? Would thousands of rams atone for their sins? Would immense quantities of oil; even rivers, ten thousand rivers, suffice for an oblation, suited to his greatness, and worthy of his acceptance? Or would a human sacrifice best appease his wrath? (as the idolaters judged respecting their deities:) Should they give their children, their first-born, to atone for their transgressions; the fruit of their bodies to expiate the guilt of their souls? These absurd, impossible, or abominable proposal, srepresent the effects of ignorant unhumbled terror upon the sinner's conscience; which is the root of superstition, in all its frivolous, cruel, and impious devices, to appease God, to quiet conscience, and merit happiness, without repentance, faith in Christ, or the sanctification of the Spirit. But to such an earnest and ignorant inquirer, the prophet answered, that the Lord had "showed him what was good:" that is, in the holy Scriptures, (and not in this verse only, as some explain it:) and therefore, if he would come before him with acceptance, it must be in the prescribed way. The holy law was good, as the standard of duty; the sacrifices and legal purifications were good, as shadows of Christ, and of his blood and sanctifying grace; as appointed means of the sinner's expressing his repentance and faith, and seeking forgiveness and acceptance; but "the testimony of Jesus "is the Spirit of prophecy," and the chief subject of revelation; and what was there in the Lord's requirements from his worshippers, that was unreasonable or hard? He only commanded them to do justly, rendering to God and man what was their due, and acting with honesty, integrity, and fidelity, without injuring, defrauding, deceiving, or oppressing any, or tempting them to sin; "to "love mercy;" taking pleasure in exercising compassion, forgiveness, and kindness, after the example of the Lord's goodness and mercy to them: and "to walk humbly with "their God;" in a teachable, dependent, submissive, patient, thankful spirit; as his creatures, as penitent sinners; and as conscious of great unworthiness, depravity, weakness, and folly; of innumerable wants, and of entire meanness and insignificance in his sight. All this is implied in, and may fairly be inferred from this passage: and we can never suppose that the prophet meant in a single verse to abrogate the ceremonial law, to supersede the necessity of a believing dependence on the promised Redeemer and his predicted atonement, or to establish another method of justification, in contradiction to the whole Scriptures: yet this is evidently the drift of some men's reasonings from this noted text, which only show how little they understand what is meant by "walking "humbly with our God." The original is, "humble thy-"self to walk before God;" intimating, that walking before God, as his accepted worshippers, though the highest honour which can be conferred on us, is so contrary to our natural pride, that we must be greatly humbled before we will come to walk thus with him; and that God so abhors pride, that, till we are humbled in his sight, we cannot be admitted to the privilege of walking with him. (Marg. Ref.) 'Hypocrites and habitual sinners hope to 'obtain God's favour, by performing the external duties 'of religion; and are willing to purchase their own par-'don on any terms, but that of reforming their lives.' (Lowth.) But are not Pharisees, and all other proud men, equally unwilling to "become as little children," to submit "to God's righteousness," to abase themselves in unreserved repentance, to renounce all pleas but that of mercy, to receive Christ Jesus as their only Saviour, and cordially to subscribe the humiliating doctrines of the Gospel? And can a sinner, however reformed in his life, come to God, and walk with him, while he neglects and dislikes the great salvation of Christ?

V. 9. The voice of the Lord, by his prophets, or judgments, cried in the city, in Samaria or Jerusalem: and the men of heavenly wisdom would in that voice perceive the name of the LORD; or they would see the glory of his perfections, and that he acted in character, and worthy of himself. They would also excite others to hear the correcting rod of God, calling them to repentance, faith, and holiness; and to consider the power, justice, truth, and goodness of him that appointed it: that they might discern how much it concerned them to take warning and obey his voice. 'He that is truly wise will 'easily discover God's authority in such a message.—'Wisdom in the Hebrew is put for the wise man.' (Lowth.) (Note, Prov. xviii. 1, 2.) The same word is rendered wisdom in the text referred to.

V. 10—15. After all warnings and corrections, the people continued to treasure up ill-gotten riches, and to practise all kinds of fraud, violence, and deceit. Therefore, the Lord determined to add to their miseries, till they were made sick, and ready to faint under his desolating judgments. They should be reduced to such scarcity, as to be unable to obtain a full meal: they should be cast down in the midst of the city, where they had lived secure and luxurious; and their miseries would be within them, as a wasting disease in the vitals; or as the falling of a building by reason of a decay of the foundation. All means of upholding or delivering them should prove vain and unsuccessful. And they should have the trouble of cultivating their fields, whilst others would seize on and enjoy their choicest productions. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. The idolatries, that had long before been established in Israel by Omri and his son Ahab and his family, were observed to the times of Micah, not only in Israel, but, as it seems, in some parts of Judah, as if of higher authority than the law of God; and their hateful maxims, counsels, and examples, were attended to. It was therefore proper, that the offenders should be exposed to contempt and desolation; and that they should bear reproach from the heathen as the worshippers of God, seeing they had acted so inconsistently with that character. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The ministers of God must be very earnest, faithful, and intrepid, in pleading his cause against his enemies: and when his controversy with his rebellious subjects, and especially with hypocrites, shall be openly decided, the whole creation will applaud his justice in their condemnation. The excellency of our God, the goodness of his laws, the grace of his Gospel, the pleasantness of his service, and the kindness of his providence, should all combine to make us ashamed of the negligence and inconstancy of our obedience: for we often act as if his service was wearisome, and we were disposed to renounce it. But were we called to speak, we could neither testify aught against him, nor urge any reasonable excuse for ourselves: nor can rebels or apostates in any measure justify themselves in departing from the living God. We should always remember the mercies that our progenitors have long ago received, and which tended to our advantage; and the oracles of God, and good teachers, rulers and examples, are to be valued among our greatest privileges. Could we know how often the Lord hath defeated the machinations of Satan and his servants against us, we should have abundant proof of his kindness, and of our own ingratitude; and this would show his righteousness in his sharpest corrections. Plain remonstrances, on this and similar subjects, tend to alarm men's consciences, and to show their need of coming before the most high God, to deprecate his wrath. In this frame of mind, they would do much, nay, almost any thing, to appease him and quiet their own consciences: but whilst they remain ignorant of the Gospel, or prejudiced against it, they will either rest in external ordinances and good behaviour, as a compound system of self-righteousness, or they will run into expensive, burdensome, and painful services, which God hath not commanded; nay, perhaps they will be seduced into an endeavour to please God by those things that are most atrocious and horrid. For if it were possible, in great terrors of conscience, men would present to the Lord ten thousand rivers of oil: and they have actually sought to expiate their guilt by the murder and massacre of heretics, by human sacrifices, and even by "giving their first-born, "the fruit of their body, for the sin of their souls!" These practices must arise from mistaken apprehensions of the divine character; and are more suited to the worshippers of Satan, than to those of JEHOVAH. Blessed be his name, he hath in his word revealed to us a way of access, a propitiatory sacrifice, and a method of applying for its benefits, that are honourable to him, and admirably suited to our case. And would we show the sincerity of our repentance, faith, and love, he requires nothing from us, but to "do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with our "God:" for, notwithstanding our manifold failures, even in this return of grateful obedience, he is ever ready to renew his pardons, and to communicate his grace to the humble waiting penitent.

V. 9—16.

In order that sinners may receive instruction, the Lord calls them by the voice of his word and by that of his providence: in these the wise behold his glory and read his character; they hear the correcting rod speak to them of the evil of sin, and their need of repentance; they learn the lessons that he teacheth, and call others to attend, and to consider who hath appointed their afflictions, that they may not murmur or despond, but derive good from them. But if this voice be disregarded, the sword of vengeance will be drawn: for so bent is man on wickedness, that amidst all judgments and warnings he is apt to proceed in covetous, fraudulent, or oppressive endeavours to grow rich, or in various ways to multiply lies and deceit. Thus heavier sufferings are ensured, the satisfaction of outward mercies is marred, and the wrath of God may be expected to corrode the inmost soul; nor can there be deliverance, except by repentance, faith, and renewed obedience. But, alas! men are much more ready to observe and cleave to iniquitous and ungodly laws, counsels, and maxims, than to walk in the good ways of the Lord; and when this is the case with his professing people, they may expect a double portion of misery and contempt.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—4. This description of the wickedness of the people, especially in Judah, has been thought inconsistent with the times of Hezekiah: and it hath therefore been considered as prophetical of the wicked reign of Manasseh. But perhaps the prophet witnessed such scenes towards the close of Hezekiah's reign, as caused him dolefully to presage the ensuing apostacy. He lamented that after all his zealous labours he could find very few pious persons: but was like a man that went into an orchard or vineyard, after the fruit had been gathered; and, instead of satisfying himself with the first ripe fruit, which was most valued and plentiful, could not find a single cluster of grapes, but only a few gleanings of inferior goodness. He longed to live among eminent believers, but he found very few that had any sense of piety, and these were far inferior to their pious ancestors. For good and merciful men were taken to heaven, and the land was deprived of them, till an upright person could scarcely be found. (Marg. Ref.) In general they sought to enrich themselves, by murdering or ruining their neighbours; even as hunters pursue their game into the net. They were exceedingly diligent and active in mischief, doing it "with "both hands earnestly," or effectually. They excelled in doing evil, with great diligence and ability. The prince, or magistrate, asked a bribe for perverting justice; and the rich oppressor had only to mention the mischief he purposed; and so the bargain was concluded, and they covered up the infamous transaction. The best of them were entangling and mischievous as briers; and created more pain and trouble to such as had dealings with them, than a thorn-hedge to those that attempted to force through it: the worst of them therefore must be serpents, or wolves and tigers. No doubt then could remain, but that the day of visitation, predicted by all Israel's watchmen, was at hand, when they would be reduced to the most perplexing straits.

8 ¶ [y] Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy: [z] when I fall, I shall arise; [a] when I sit in darkness, [b] the LORD shall be a light unto me.

V. 5—7. The people in general were so deceitful that the few honest persons among them had need to be cautious: no friend, counsellor, or guide, could safely be trusted: nay, it would be dangerous freely to disclose their minds to their own wives, lest they should be hired to betray them. All regard to relative duty and subordination was vanished: children were become undutiful and rebellious, and a man's own family often proved his worst enemies, especially if he disgusted them by his piety. (Marg. Ref.) The prophet therefore saw no safety or comfort, but in looking to the Lord, and waiting on God his Salvation, who would be sure to hear and help him, and those that followed his example. Our Lord quotes the sixth verse, and applies it to the persecutions about to be raised against his disciples: and a careful examination of the marginal references will convince any one, that the character of the Jews, in those days, exactly answered the description here given.

V. 8—10. Jerusalem, (or the church,) seems to be here introduced as speaking by the prophet. Assyria, Babylon, Edom, or Antichrist, is addressed as an insulting triumphing adversary, whose rejoicing would be short. Though Jerusalem had fallen, or was about to fall into deep distress, yet she would arise again out of it: though sorrow and affliction should oppress her, yet the Lord would again shine upon and enlighten her. She would therefore compose herself to bear the fatherly corrections of God, which her sins had provoked, and submit to his displeasure with patience and hope. As she had not injured her insulting enemy, she would wait for the Lord to plead her cause and execute judgment for her. She was indeed covered with disgrace and calumny, as well as misery; but God would bring her forth from her dark retreat, and clear her aspersed character; and manifest his truth and righteousness in delivering her and punishing her persecutors. Then her enemy would witness her returning prosperity and purity with confusion and terror; and would with shame recollect her insulting inquiries of her in the depth of her misery, whilst she demanded, "Where "is the LORD thy God?" And then Jerusalem would behold her rival trodden down with extreme contempt, to rise no more. The deliverance of the Jews from captivity, and the destruction of Babylon, were predicted, as typical of other and more important deliverances of the Church, and destruction of her enemies. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11—13. When the appointed time for rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem should arrive, the decrees of the kings of Babylon, or of Persia, forbidding that work, would be removed far away: and the Jews would flock to Jerusalem from every region, whither they had been dispersed; without being allured to stay away, by the distance or advantages of their situations. But the conversion of sinners to Christ, in the days of the apostles, and especially in those glorious times every where predicted, was shadowed forth by those events. Though such blessings were reserved for Israel in after ages, yet the wickedness of the nation would certainly bring on them the threatened desolations. 'The general restoration of the Jews shall not 'be brought to pass, till after their land hath lain desolate 'for some ages, as a testimony of God's displeasure against 'the ancient inhabitants for their sins, especially that 'heinous one of rejecting the Messiah.' (Lowth.)

V. 14—17. The prophet here entreated the Lord to feed his people, (the flock which he valued as his heritage,) with his rod, or by his word, Spirit, and providence, even during their dispersions in distant lands, where they would be exposed and be solitary as sheep. But let him feed them on mount Carmel; and provide for them, as for the flocks in Bashan and Gilead, where was good pasturage; or as he had fed their fathers in ancient times: that is, he prayed that God would preserve them during the captivity, and restore them to their own land, and prosper them in it as in their most flourishing times. To this prayer the Lord answered, that he would renew his ancient wonders in their deliverance; which the nations beholding, should be astonished and silenced, not daring to oppose their power, though they stopped their ears to the truth. They would thus be degraded to the dust, grovelling on the earth as serpents, and afraid to show themselves, as worms that seldom creep from their holes: for they would fear the wrath of God, who thus pleaded the cause of his people.—This too must predict greater deliverances and triumphs of the Church, and debasement and terror of her enemies, than those that took place, when Sennacherib's army was destroyed, when Babylon was taken, and the Jews liberated by Cyrus, or when the Maccabees were victorious over their persecutors: and doubtless those events were intended, which it hath repeatedly been proved that all the prophets foretold. 'If the expressions are thought too strong for 'the events which happened under the Maccabees, they 'may likewise have a reference to the times of the future 'restoration.' (Bp. Newcombe.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18—20. The prophet concluded his predictions, by celebrating, with admiring, adoring love and gratitude, the praises of God's mercy and truth, in his dealings with his people. Who, that ever was worshipped as God, could pretend to equal JEHOVAH in his perfections and operations? What could be found worthy to be compared with his readiness to pardon the sins, and to remit the punishment, of his heritage; notwithstanding that their transgressions had provoked him to reduce them to a remnant? Though he might justly have retained his anger for ever, yet he did not, because he ever delights in exercising mercy. This had often been evinced: and though heavy judgments were about to come upon the Jews, yet he would return to them with tender compassion, and subdue the power, as well as pardon the guilt of their sins, and so entirely take them away, that they should be, as it were, for ever buried in the depths of the sea. Thus he would fulfil the engagements of his covenant and oath, that he made to Abraham and Jacob, for the glory of his mercy and faithfulness. These engagements evidently related to Christ, and the success of his Gospel, to the end of time; and the future restoration of Israel, and the final prevalence of true religion in all lands will be the complete performance of them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—10.

It is a heavy trial to pious persons to be deprived of the communion of the saints, especially when it is owing to the decay of godliness, and a decrease in the numbers and zeal of believers. Alas! we may long in vain for the company of many such Christians, as were the first ripe fruits of the Gospel in those happy times, when "great "grace was upon them all," and "the Lord added to the "Church daily such as should be saved." Believers of this description are generally scarce; and when they are removed to heaven, the earth suffers a very grievous loss; and we should long earnestly to see their posterity copy their examples, or others raised up in their places to be the instruments of extensive good. We may, however, be thankful, that we meet with a few gleanings of this vintage; though, alas! the greater part of professed Christians seem given up to selfishness, fraud, iniquity, and ungodliness. Even they who ought to support equity and patronize religion, too commonly "do evil with both "hands earnestly;" and by their venality and concurrence in iniquity, help each other to grow rich and great: and thus they conceal many an infamous transaction, which the Lord will at length unfold before the whole world. We cannot but lament the malice and mischievousness of multitudes on every side, and grieve to think of the misery that is coming upon them: we must grieve that so little confidence can be placed in those who make the greatest professions of friendship; and that even the nearest relatives should so often forget their obligations, and prove unfaithful, and the sources of the most painful afflictions, to those connected with them. But if the believer finds that his worst foes are those of his own family, he should be rendered more simple in his dependence, and fervent in his prayers to the God of his salvation, who will never refuse to hear and help him. We should also, under our trials, look continually unto our divine Redeemer, that we may learn to copy his patience, meekness, constancy, and love, amidst all his unequalled injuries and agonies; and thus become examples to those around us. If we truly belong to him, we shall share his victories, as well as be conformed to him in sufferings. Though our enemies may seem to prevail and rejoice over us, we should not despond, or decline the conflict: though cast down, we are not destroyed: though foiled, we are not slain; and ought therefore to resume our arms, and renew the combat. Our darkness, through temptation, tribulation, or persecution, will not long prevent our comfort in the Lord, our Light and Salvation. Though we have often and grievously sinned, and are suffering under the rod of his fatherly displeasure, yet we may unite hope in his mercy with submission to his correction; for he will at length plead our cause, and bring us forth to the light, clear our characters from slanderous imputations, and fulfil to us his faithful promises: so that all, who have derided our confidence in God, because of difficulties and distresses, shall be covered with shame; and those that hate us, for his sake, shall be trodden down as the mire in the streets.

V. 11—20.

No hinderances can obstruct the intended favours of God to his Church or servants: and their returning peace and comfort allure others to come and join themselves to them. Let us then continue in prayer to the Lord, that he would graciously feed his dispersed flock: his heritage, that dwell "in the world, but are not of it;" and that he would support us and our brethren under all disconsolations and trials, and make us joyful in him, as his people were in days of old. Then will he hear our prayers and renew his ancient wonders, and make us victorious over every opposer; and at length all his enemies and those of his Church shall be filled with terror, and have their portion with the old serpent, the tempter and murderer of mankind. Let us then rejoice, and praise the pardoning mercy of our God; let us hope and pray that he will turn to us, and turn us to himself; that he will have compassion on us, and subdue, as well as forgive, our sins, and fully and finally deliver us from these our inward and most dangerous foes. Let us rely on the mercy and truth, engaged by covenant and oath to Abraham and all his believing children; and remember that the Lord hath given this infallible security, for "the strong consolation "of all those that have fled for refuge to lay hold on the "hope set before them" in Christ Jesus.

BOOK OF NAHUM.

It is probably conjectured, that Nahum delivered this prophecy about the time when Sennacherib invaded Judah. It relates almost entirely to the destruction of Nineveh and of the Assyrian empire, of which the cutting off of Sennacherib's army was an earnest and presage; and its primary intent seems to have been the encouragement of the pious Jews, amidst the troubles and alarms occasioned by that invasion — It does not appear, that this short prophecy is referred to in the New Testament: yet it certainly formed a part of that volume which Christ and his apostles called "the Scriptures," "the oracles of God." No other prediction is clearly contained in it, but that of the desolations of Nineveh; 'that vast and 'populous city, whose walls were an hundred feet high, and capable of admitting three chariots abreast 'upon them, and fortified with fifteen hundred towers, in walls of two hundred feet high!—So totally, 'indeed, was this city destroyed, that in the second century after Christ not a vestige remained of it, to 'ascertain the spot on which it stood. Its situation has long been a matter of doubt and uncertainty.' (Note, iii. 19.) 'This remarkable prophecy, thus remarkably accomplished, affords a signal evidence 'of the inspiration of Nahum, and a striking lesson of humility to human pride.' (Gray's Key.) The best judges are agreed, that, in respect of arrangement, style, and sublimity, it is one of the most finished poems extant in human language.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. Jonah had long before preached to the Ninevites, and their repentance had for the time averted the threatened vengeance: but as they relapsed into idolatry and wickedness, and were become most cruel enemies to God's people, Nahum had a vision of terrible destruction that was coming upon them, which he wrote in a book, and as some think sent to them. (Notes, Jer. xxiii. 33—40.) His name signifies a comforter, and this prediction would comfort the afflicted Jews. He was called the Elkoshite, from Elkosh in Galilee, the place of his birth or habitation, as it is supposed.

[o] the hills melt, and [p] the earth is burned at his presence, yea, the world, and all that dwell therein.

6 Who [q] can stand before his indignation? and who can * abide in the fierceness of his anger? [r] his fury is poured out like fire, and the rocks are thrown down by him.

7 The [s] LORD is good, [t] a † Stronghold [u] in the day of trouble; [x] and he knoweth them [y] that trust in him.

8 But [z] with an over-running flood he will make an utter end of [a] the place thereof, and [b] darkness shall pursue his enemies.

9 What [c] do ye imagine against the LORD? [d] he will make an utter end: affliction shall not rise up the second time.

10 For [e] while they be folden together as thorns, and while they are [f] drunken as drunkards, [g] they shall be devoured as stubble fully dry.

11 There is [h] one come out of thee, that imagineth evil against the LORD; a ‡ wicked counsellor.

12 Thus saith the LORD; ◊ Though they be quiet, and likewise many, [i] yet thus shall they be ‖ cut down, when he shall [k] pass through. Though I have afflicted thee, I will afflict thee no more.

V. 2—6. The Assyrians had desolated the kingdom of Israel; they often harassed that of Judah, and perhaps at this time menaced its ruin; and they triumphed as if their idols had overcome the God of Israel. The prophet therefore began this "burden of Nineveh," by declaring that God was jealous of his glory, and revenged himself with fury or great severity, on those that despised or blasphemed him, or injured his worshippers; and that "he reserved "for his enemies;" the word wrath is not in the original; nor could words express the punishment that he reserved in due time to inflict upon them. Indeed, the Lord was "slow to anger," and not hasty in executing vengeance; because he was "great in power," and always able to execute his purposes: but he would by no means acquit the wicked, or obstinate impenitent offenders. (Note, Ex. xxxiv. 6, 7.) His dispensations were indeed very mysterious; and when he came to execute vengeance, his way was through whirlwinds, storms, and black clouds, as if they were the dust of his feet. He would show similar tokens of his power and indignation, as he had done of old, when the sea was divided and Jordan dried up before him; when the mountains trembled, and their productions were withered at his presence: even the earth, yea, the whole world, would at last be burned up before him, and all its inhabitants destroyed. What man, or kingdom, therefore, could withstand him, when his fury should be poured out like fire, and the rocks should be cast down before him? This was a most suitable introduction to predictions of vengeance on proud Nineveh, and her king and inhabitants.

V. 7, 8. The preceding most sublime display of the power of the Lord's anger is next beautifully contrasted with a declaration of his exuberant goodness to his people. The Assyrian invasion, and the insulting menaces of Sennacherib and his captains, formed a day of trouble to Hezekiah and his subjects: but the Lord was a Strong-hold to them; he knew, and approved, those that trusted in him, and would distinguish them from all others. But he would destroy Nineveh, and desolate the place where it stood as with an inundation; and pursue his enemies the Assyrians with dark and tremendous calamities. The place where Nineveh stood is not at present exactly known. 'Nineveh is already perished, and there is no remaining 'trace of her.' (Lucian, an ingenious heathen, who wrote in the second century.)

V. 9, 10. Sennacherib, (as well as Shalmanesar and his predecessors,) devised to destroy the worshippers of God, which was considered as designing evil against JEHOVAH himself; being the result of proud enmity to him and defiance of him. He would therefore utterly destroy Nineveh and the Assyrian empire; and the calamity should be so complete, that it would not be necessary to repeat it. Whilst they formed powerful confederacies, and raised numerous armies, to execute their mischievous counsels, "being folden together as thorns;" and while they were perplexed in their counsels, and indecisive in their measures, like a drunken man; or while indulging in excess and intoxication, they would be suddenly and totally consumed, as the dry stubble is by the fire. It is recorded that Nineveh was taken by the Babylonians and Medes, when the city was full of riot and intemperance, by reason of a feast, which the king and his nobles celebrated.

V. 11—13. This wicked counsellor, who devised evil against the Lord, seems to mark out Sennacherib, who came from Nineveh to utter blasphemies by the mouth of Rabshakeh, and who devised to destroy Jerusalem: for this completed the provocation, that brought the vengeance of God on Nineveh and on the Assyrian empire. The Lord therefore declared, that though the army of Sennacherib was quiet, fearing nothing from the dismayed Jews, and though they were very numerous, yet the destroying angel, when he passed through them, would cut them down, as the scythe of the mower does the tender grass. And though the Lord had afflicted the Jews by the Assyrians, yet he would no more distress them by their invasions, but would wholly deliver them from the yoke, which had before been very galling to them.

14 And the LORD hath [o] given a commandment concerning thee, [p] that no more of thy name be sown: [q] out of the house of thy gods will I cut off the graven image and the molten image: [r] I will make thy grave; [s] for thou art vile.

15 Behold [t] upon the mountains the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace! O Judah, * keep thy solemn feasts, [u] perform thy vows: for † the wicked shall [x] no more pass through thee; he is utterly cut off.

V. 14. The Lord had given orders that Sennacherib's army should be cut off; but he himself was reserved for execution by the hands of his own sons. Esarhaddon his son, indeed, succeeded him, and reigned prosperously many years: but the Assyrian empire was subverted soon after, and probably that family was extinct, at least their power was annihilated; and no more of that seed was permitted to be sown or to grow upon the earth. The idols also of Nineveh were about to be extirpated: the graves of the city, the empire, and the royal family, were preparing; and because they were vile in their conduct they would be very greatly debased. 'The house of thy idol shall become 'thy grave, when thou shalt be dishonourably slain by thy 'own sons; as a just punishment of thy blasphemy against 'the God of Israel.' (Lowth.)

V. 15, (Marg. Ref.) Messengers would be sent from Jerusalem into the most distant parts of the land, to carry the welcome tidings of the destruction of Sennacherib's army; and of the peace of Jerusalem and Judah; and to invite the Jews to come and celebrate their solemn feasts, and to pay their vows at the temple for their deliverance. They might then do it safely; for the Assyrian tyrant would no more pass through to ravage the land, his power being utterly cut off. This may be considered as typical of the future destruction of the enemies of the Church, which will make way for the universal preaching of the Gospel, and for the peace and felicity of believers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The scriptural character of our glorious God does not accord to the imaginations and sentiments of proud reasoners on that subject: for, admiring their own supposed excellencies, they form notions of God conformable to them, and thus admire and worship an ideal deity. But "the God "and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mer-"cies," is also "jealous, and revengeth;" and executeth most terrible punishments on those, who rebel against his authority, oppose his truth, or persecute his people. He is indeed slow to wrath, and ready to forgive the penitent and believing: but he will by no means acquit the wicked; and he reserveth "tribulation and anguish for every soul "of man that doeth evil." But who regardeth the power of his wrath? When he shall arise to execute vengeance on his enemies, the whole creation will tremble, and melt or be consumed with fervent heat: and all things will concur in augmenting the dismay and destruction of the ungodly. "Who then will be able to stand before his indignation, or to abide the fierceness of his anger, when his fury shall be poured out like fire, and the rocks and mountains shall be thrown down by him?" What will it then avail the condemned criminal to reflect, that he hath amused himself and others by specious reasonings against the awful justice, holiness, and vengeance of his offended Sovereign; and soothed conscience into a delusive peace by vain speculations? But a believing apprehension of the goodness and mercy of God, as consisting with his perfect justice through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, and a reliance on him for pardon and peace, induce a well-grounded confidence and assurance. They that come in this way to trust in the Lord will find him their Strong-hold and impregnable Fortress, in every time of trouble and danger; and he will make it appear that he approved and favoured them; whilst his enemies shall be carried away as with a flood into the blackness of darkness and despair. For they that imagine evil against God, and his truth and cause, will be utterly destroyed: and their mischievous combinations and intoxicating revels will prepare them as thorns folded together, or as dry stubble for the fire of his wrath: nor will their multitudes, their confidence, their sagacity, or abilities, in the least secure them. For a time indeed the Lord employs such men to scourge his offending children, and to winnow the corn of his floor: but he will soon break off their yoke, terminate their power, and forbid them any more to afflict his Church. All idols and idolaters, and all the vile and abominable of the earth, will soon be buried in the grave that the Lord is preparing for them; and then Zion shall rejoice and celebrate her solemn feasts, and pay her vows, and never more be troubled with the wicked passing through her. Let us then rejoice in the glad tidings and peace of the Gospel: let us gladly attend on sacred ordinances, as the sacred feasts of our souls: let us remember to pay the vows that we made in the day of our distress and trouble: and so look forward with cheerful hope to our admission into that world, whither the wicked never can enter, and where sin and temptation will no more be known.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. (Note, 2 Kings xxiv. 1.) Nabopollazar king of Babylon, or Nebuchadnezzar his son, seems to be here particularly intended by "the dasher in "pieces," to denote his fierceness and success in war. In conjunction with Cyaxares king of Media, he marched his army to besiege Nineveh, with the avowed purpose of subverting the Assyrian empire: and the king and people of Nineveh are here challenged to employ every art of defence, and to exert all their courage and prowess to defend the city against them; which would all be in vain. For the Lord would avenge on Nineveh the pride and insolence that the Assyrian kings had shown to Jacob, when they magnified themselves against them and grievously oppressed them. They had utterly destroyed the kingdom of Israel, and reduced its inhabitants to slavery in foreign lands; and they had harassed, distressed, and endeavoured to ruin, the kingdom of Judah. Thus they had gathered and carried off the fruit, and marred the branch of the Lord's vineyard: and he was about to execute vengeance upon them. "For JEHOVAH restoreth the excellency of "Jacob, as the excellency of Israel." (Bp. Newcombe.) —'This interpretation agrees better with the scope of 'the text, and suits very well with the Hebrew idiom.' (Lowth.)

V. 3—6. The soldiers of the confederate kings carried red shields and wore scarlet garments, to render their appearance more terrible, and to denote their purpose of shedding blood without fear or mercy. Their chariots of war glittered like torches when they were preparing for the assault, and the brandishing of their spears was like the shaking of fir-trees by a terrible tempest. And when they had broken into the city, their chariots would rage and justle, and be driven with speed and fury, like flaming torches or flashes of lightning. The king of Babylon would recount his valiant captains, and order them to the assault; and their numbers, impetuosity, and contempt of danger and difficulty, would cause them to stumble in marching hastily to mount the walls. Some understand this of the Assyrian king and his army. The besiegers, however, would prepare to defend themselves: but the river Tigris, or other rivers that ran into it, being disregarded, would open the assailants a passage into the city: and the palace being seized on and destroyed, the city would soon be reduced. It is recorded, that an inundation of the Tigris broke down a part of the walls of Nineveh, and thus opened to the besiegers a way into the heart of the city.

V. 7. Huzzab signifies established. Some take it for the name of the queen consort, who would thus be led captive. Perhaps the empire of Assyria, or Nineveh, was poetically represented as a queen, that had been established in great security, but was about to be brought forth, and carried captive to Babylon; and the captivity of the nobles and people of Nineveh might be represented, by this queen being attended by her maidens, mourning like doves, and beating their breasts, as a tabret is struck repeatedly by those who play on it.

V. 8—10. Nineveh had neither been taken nor put in fear for many ages: so that it was like an undisturbed pool, or fish-pond replenished with great quantities of fish. But at the predicted time, her soldiers would flee before their enemies, and all the efforts of their captains to stop them would be ineffectual. The besiegers might then seize upon their immense treasures and all their magnificent furniture: for Nineveh would be emptied and desolated, with the extreme terror and anguish of the inhabitants. (Marg. Ref.) The original is peculiarly animated, and in the highest degree poetical.

V. 11—13. The kings of Assyria had long been terrible, powerful, and cruel to their neighbours, like lions to the beasts of the forest, or of the pasture. Their successful wars enriched and advanced their families, and supported them in the most luxurious and magnificent manner. But what was become of this lion's den? Of Nineveh, that mighty city? The Lord, being against the wickedness of their kings, would certainly consume their power, destroy their posterity, spoil them of their prey, and silence the voice of their ambassadors, whom they sent to insult, menace, and exact upon the conquered nations; or to blaspheme God and revile his people, as Rabshakeh had done. And then the nations would rejoice at their fall. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

What delight have men in every age taken in dashing others in pieces, though by exposing themselves to similar destruction!—The event of the cruel contests of proud mortals for power, renown, or wealth, is entirely ordered by the just and holy God; who sometimes employs them to correct his people, and at other times to execute vengeance on oppressors and murderers. The consideration of the horrors and miseries of war should make us thankful for the blessings of peace, and excite us to pray for the continuance of them. Yet we ought always to be prepared for troubles, for we know not how soon they may arrive. We should then be careful not to contract habits of effeminacy, delicacy, or self-indulgence; for these disqualify men for enduring hardship, and render poverty or captivity doubly terrible. We ought also to beware of covetousness, ostentation, and magnificence: for what will treasures or glory do for us, in the seasons of extreme distress, or in the day of wrath? Yet, in making such acquisitions for themselves or their families, how many lose their souls! We should use power or prosperity with gentleness and moderation; for selfishness, arrogance, and inhumanity, expose men to the wrath of God, and the hatred of their neighbours also. If the Lord be against any persons or nations, they must soon be rendered miserable, and sink into silence and darkness. Let us then come to him upon his mercy-seat, that, having peace with him through our Lord Jesus Christ, we may know that he is for us, and that all things shall work together for our everlasting good.

V. 4—6. The idolatries and sorceries of Nineveh, and that licentiousness with which they were attended, and the captivating methods by which the Assyrians brought other nations to submit to their authority, or to unite in their idolatries and iniquities, are here assigned as the reasons of the Lord's determination to expose them to the greatest ignominy and misery imaginable: in the same manner as they had utterly disregarded the welfare of whole nations, and given them to be spoiled and ruined without remorse. Israel and Judah especially had been thus treated by them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8—11. Populous No, or, No-Ammon. (Marg.) No-Ammon, in Egypt, (concerning the situation of which learned men are not agreed,) seems to have been desolated, in the manner here described, a short time before this prophecy was delivered: some think that Sennacherib had just taken and destroyed it. It had been very populous, situated in a very fertile soil, and fortified by nature and art in an almost impregnable manner. As an Ethiopian then reigned over Egypt, the immense forces of these two kingdoms were combined for its defence, together with the assistance of the Libyans and Mauritanians, and other nations of Africa: yet was the city taken, and its inhabitants carried captive, after the most shocking cruelties had been exercised upon numbers of them, and even upon their infants; whilst their most honourable men were divided by lot among the conquerors as slaves, and so led away in chains. And were the inhabitants of Nineveh better than those of No, or more likely to be preserved from such a ruin? By no means: on the contrary, they would be infatuated with prosperity, or stupified by excess or calamity; they would hide themselves within their walls, and look out in vain for assistance against their besiegers.

V. 12. Fig-trees. 'The image, though a common 'one, is very lively and expressive.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 14. Go, &c. That is, make bricks and prepare mortar, in order to erect new fortifications, if possible, to repel the enemy.

V. 15—17. 'Whilst thou art repairing the old fortifications, or making new ones, the enemy shall set thy 'works on fire. The sword of thine enemies, who shall 'be as numerous and destructive as locusts or canker-'worms, shall destroy thee.' 'As the locusts destroy the 'fruits of the earth, and fly away to another place; so 'shall thy soldiers pillage all the wealth thou hast gained 'by traffic, and then leave thee.' (Lowth.) Nineveh, by commerce, became extremely populous: but the number of her traders, when the city was besieged would consume her provisions, as caterpillars waste the land. Perhaps mercenary soldiers are meant, who having devoured the produce of the country, fled or deserted to the enemy, when their help was wanted. Even their tributary kings, or most honourable captains, would resemble locusts, that remove when the sun grows hot; for they would abide with them whilst danger was distant, but would be gone when the enemy approached. 'The tributary princes 'deserted Nineveh in the day of her distress.' (Herodotus.) 'Diodorus Siculus, speaking of the siege in which 'Nineveh fell, says, When the enemy shut up the king 'in the city many nations revolted, each going over to 'the besiegers for the sake of their liberty; that the king 'dispatched messengers to all his subjects, requiring 'forces from them, to assist him; and that he thought 'himself able to endure a siege, and remained in expec-'tation of the armies, which were to be raised throughout 'the empire; relying on an oracle, that the city could not 'be taken, till the river became its enemy.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 18. The rulers of Assyria were become supine, self-indulgent, and negligent, or they would be disheartened and debased; and they would be slain and left upon the ground; while the people were scattered as lost sheep, without any to seek after them.

V. 19. Upon, &c. Nineveh had corrupted, or oppressed by her wickedness, all the surrounding nations, continually during many ages: therefore all the nations would rejoice at her fall. The obsolete word bruit signifies report. The entire desolation of Nineveh is in this prophecy most expressly and particularly foretold: yet no event can be imagined more improbable, at the time when Nahum wrote, than this was. The entire desolation of London, so that none could decide where this great metropolis was situated, would not be considered by us as more improbable, than the desolations of Nineveh must have appeared at that day; when it was the greatest, and most populous and powerful, city in the known world. Yet, when conquered by the kings of Babylon, who transferred the seat of empire to the city which they had built for their own glory, Nineveh was deserted by its inhabitants, and left to moulder into ruins; and within two hundred years after the coming of Christ, no trace remained of this vast capital of the Assyrian empire! And now it is not agreed, either among learned men or travellers, or the inhabitants of those regions, where Nineveh stood! some even place it on the Euphrates. But of those who agree that it stood on the Tigris, some place it on one side, some on the other, of that river; and some higher up, and some nearer the sea, by many miles. I do not say, that these discordant opinions are alike probable; for most well informed and competent judges would perhaps nearly agree, except as to the exact spot where the city stood: yet the very circumstance, of so many discordant opinions, is the completest proof imaginable that the prediction has been most wonderfully accomplished; and that it was delivered by the inspiration of that God, "known "unto whom are all his works, from the beginning of the "world."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Very flourishing cities are often full of lies and robbery, of fraud and injustice; and in general they are contaminated with blood, shed in massacres, persecutions, oppression of dependent provinces, or iniquitous war: and by these means the prey is accumulated, and departeth not till the Lord constrains them to make restitution: but he will recompense the crimes of such cities and kingdoms, and pour out the blood of those who are lavish of the blood of others. —Too often they resemble well-favoured harlots; and disseminate far and wide their impiety, infidelity, licentiousness and vice; and the nations are corrupted by their example, or enslaved to support their grandeur and luxury, or to gratify their avarice and ambition. The Lord will surely express his abhorrence of such politics and practices; and will turn the glory of such cities into shame, and make them vile, and as a gazing stock to others. Thus Nineveh, Babylon, Tyre, and many others, have been reduced and ruined, that they might be a warning to us; even as No was to Nineveh. And what better are we, than these ancient cities or kingdoms? except as there is a remnant of true Christians among us, who are a greater security and a stronger rampart to us, than all our advantages of situation; than our fleets, armies, or allies, even though our strength should appear to be infinite. In these respects we are not superior to the cities and empires that have been mentioned: and the multitude of the nation are equally wicked, amid vastly superior advantages for being holy. When the Lord shows himself against a people, their enemies have an easy victory, and power to destroy their children, or enslave their nobles and honourable men. Then their strong-holds are taken upon the first assault; their valiant soldiers become as women; their efforts are unsuccessful, their confederates treacherous, their helpers the immediate causes of their ruin: and every confidence must fail, till their wounds become grievous and incurable; and all, on whom their wickedness hath passed continually, will rejoice and exult at their fall. Thus will it at length happen to all the enemies of God: but he continues good to Israel, a Strong-hold in every time of trouble, that cannot be stormed and taken; and "he knoweth them that "trust in him."

BOOK OF HABAKKUK.

The absurd and contradictory legends of the Jewish writers concerning this prophet, are not worthy of notice, except as they show how little dependence can be placed on such witnesses. Some pretend that he was the son of the Shunamitish woman, whom Elisha restored to life! While others, (especially the apocryphal book of Bel and the dragon;) introduce him as feeding Daniel in the den of lions, just before the return of the Jews from Babylon. It is, however, plain that he prophesied before the captivity, and probably about the close of Josiah's reign, and the beginning of Jehoiakim's, being contemporary with Jeremiah. 'Habakkuk stands high in the class of the Hebrew poets. The beautiful connexion 'between the parts of this prophecy; its diction, imagery, spirit, and sublimity, cannot be too much 'admired.' (Bp. Newcombe.) He is repeatedly quoted as an inspired writer in the New Testament. (Comp. i. 5. with Acts xiii. 40, 41. and ii. 3, 4. with Rom. i. 17. Gal. iii. 11. Heb. x. 37, 38:) and his predictions of the devastations made by the Chaldeans, and the judgments to be inflicted on them, are generally considered as including the temporary success and final ruin of the oppressors and corrupters of the Christian Church, and the final and universal prevalence of true religion throughout the earth. —'Nahum foretold the destruction of the Assyrians, who carried the ten tribes captive;—Habakkuk 'foretells the judgments that should come on the Chaldeans, who completed the captivity of the remaining 'tribes.' (Lowth.)—The prophet begins with complaints of the wickedness of his people, and then proceeds to predict the Chaldean invasion and its terrible effects. He bewails the successful wickedness of the invaders; gives encouragement to God's people, and denounces judgments on his enemies: and he concludes with celebrating, in the highest strains of sublime poetry, the ancient wonders that the Lord had wrought for Israel, in order to excite confidence and joy in him, in the prospect of approaching calamities.

'there are those which raise up strife and contention 'against me.' (Bp. Hall.) It appears, that the prophet had long lamented the abounding and increasing wickedness of his people, and prayed that God would put some effectual stop to it: but it continued to prevail, and he was tempted to conclude that his prayers were disregarded. He also complained, that the Lord constrained him to behold violence and iniquity; whilst the poor were crushed and cruelly plundered by the powerful. He inquired why his lot was cast in such evil times, that he was forced to dwell among robbers and oppressors, and to witness discords and virulent contentions? These things were become so common, and the rulers were so addicted to bribery, that the law lay dormant, and the execution of it was entirely relaxed; so that wicked men circumvented and defrauded the righteous with impunity: for either no sentence could be obtained, or it proved an iniquitous decision. Such was the wretched condition of Judah; and it was the consequence of idolatry, impiety, or hypocrisy in religion.

V. 5. In answer to the prophet's complaint, the Lord showed him that the Chaldeans would speedily execute vengeance on the Jews. They were, therefore, warned to give peculiar attention to the events which took place among the heathen, by the victories of the Chaldeans; or to consider themselves as one of the nations that were to be scourged by them: or they were reminded that they would wonder with great astonishment, when scattered among the heathen, at the accomplishment of those predictions, which at present they disregarded. For they would not believe that God would work such a work, at least in their days and by the Chaldeans, though God himself informed them, by his prophets, that he certainly would. The application of this by St. Paul to the Jews in his days, evinces that the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans was an emblem, or anticipation, of the calamities that came on the nation for rejecting the Gospel. (Acts xiii. 41.) The apostle quoted the passage from the Septuagint, rather than from the original text: yet the quotation does not exactly accord to either. The Greek translators seem to have read Begadim, or, despisers, instead of Bagoyim, among the heathen. This, with another trivial variation, gives nearly the rendering of the passage, as it stands in the Acts. The meaning is not materially different: and it is not necessary to decide which is the true reading.

—In your days. 'Hence it follows, that the Chaldeans 'invaded Judea, while those were living whom the pro-'phet addressed.' (Bp. Newcombe.) As Jerusalem was destroyed within less than thirty years from the death of Josiah; and as the Chaldeans were not, till about that time, very formidable among the nations: it may be probably conjectured, that Habakkuk delivered this prophecy about the end of Josiah's reign, or soon after his death; and that the circumstance of the obscure Chaldeans, rather than the renowned Assyrians, being appointed to accomplish it, conduced to harden the people in unbelief.

V. 6. Bitter, &c. That is, fierce, cruel, and impetuous, bearing all down before them, regardless of the miseries which they occasioned.

V. 7. The decisions and regulations of the Chaldeans would be framed entirely according to their own caprice, and to confirm their own authority, without any regard to the good of the people: they would consider their prosperity and dignity as proceeding from their own courage and conduct, and glory in them on that ground; and they would not consider themselves as accountable to any superior for their use of them.

V. 8. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. Shall sup, &c. That is, they would devour all before them, as the unwholesome east wind blasts and withers the productions of the earth. (Marg. Ref.)—'Some render the words, "Whatsoever they gather, they "shall carry it toward the east," 'meaning to Babylon.' (Lowth.)

V. 11. The rapid and uninterrupted success of the king of Babylon against the Jews and the adjacent nations, would intoxicate him with arrogance, and cause him to pass all bounds of reason, moderation, or decency, in his oppression and impieties; and he would greatly offend the Lord, who had prospered his undertaking, by imputing his success to his idol Belus, or Nebo. This may refer to the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar set up; and to his extraordinary insanity, which was the punishment and cure of his pride: and perhaps Belshazzar's arrogance and blasphemy also might be alluded to, which preceded the ruin of the Chaldean monarchy, and the deliverance of the Jews from captivity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12—17. The prophet again poured out his complaints before God, in the prospect of the dreadful calamities which were coming on his people from the Chaldeans. He had hoped, that the Lord would reform the nation by gentler corrections, or by raising up eminent instruments for that work: but when he understood the heavy judgments to be inflicted upon them, he was grieved, even as he had been by witnessing their crimes; he was astonished, that God would punish his offending worshippers by so wicked and idolatrous a people as the Chaldeans: and he still hoped that he would not finally leave them in their hands. As an Israelite, and as representing that nation, he addressed God, the everlasting JEHOVAH, his God, his eternal and unchangeable Portion, and the glorious Object of his adoration; "his Holy One," who was perfect in justice, truth, goodness, and purity: he was therefore assured that he and his people should not die, or be utterly cut off by their enemies. The Lord had indeed ordained and established the Chaldeans in power, to judge his people, to distinguish betwixt hypocrites and believers, to punish the one, to correct the other for their good, and thus to reform the nation. But he was of purer eyes, than to behold iniquity without abhorrence; and therefore he would by no means countenance injustice, treachery, or tyranny. Why then would he look on, and keep silence, as an unconcerned spectator, whilst these wicked idolaters devoured those that were more righteous than themselves? Why did he so prosper the cruel and rapacious, as to enable them to prey upon their inferiors, as the sea-monsters and large fishes do upon the multitude of the smaller fishes; or as reptiles are destroyed by more powerful creatures, having none to rule over or protect them? Indeed, men became the prey of their own species, as fishes are taken by the fishermen, without being able to make any effectual resistance; whilst some were drawn out by the angle, others by the cast-net or the draw-net. Thus the victorious Chaldeans would prey upon the helpless Jews, and rejoice in their miseries and their own successful wickedness; and ascribe their victories to means and instruments, to their sword, courage, and conduct, by which they lived in plenty and luxury; and not to the living God, who alone giveth men power to grow rich and great. And this would increase their propensity to vain glory or vain idolatry; in which they would act as absurdly, as if the fisherman should offer sacrifice or burn incense to his net, when he had taken a large draught of fishes, or grew rich by his occupation. But would the Lord permit them thus to gather and hoard up wealth by fraud and rapine, and to destroy whole nations, (especially his own nation,) to aggrandize themselves?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—11.

The servants of God cannot but be greatly afflicted, by witnessing the prevalence of ungodliness, iniquity, violence, and contention; especially among those that profess the truth. This will excite their earnest cries; and it will often cause them to complain, that the Lord delays to hear their prayers and to prosper their labours, and constrains them to stand by while his law is despised and trampled on, the laws of men are slacked or perverted, and the wicked are allowed to compass about the righteous, and to ruin him by iniquitous judgments. But sometimes their prayers and complaints are answered in a way of which they were not aware; and the Lord lifts up a standard against the incursions of impiety, by meeting them with desolating judgments. Even when he gives warning that this is his purpose, few to whom it is told will believe it. Most men presume upon continued prosperity, or that calamities will not come in their days: so that when predicted judgments overwhelm guilty nations or individuals, "they marvellously wonder," as if no intimation had been given about them! But when the Lord has work of this kind to do, he can soon raise up bitter and hasty instruments, to desolate countries, and seize upon dwelling-places that are not theirs; men whose pride and arrogance are as terrible as their cruelty and fierceness. Their valour, speed, and success, are from God: but their barbarity, rapacity, and treachery, and the abuse of their power and dignity, are of themselves. These influence them to ravage nations, to destroy or enslave millions, to deride and scorn princes, and to take pleasure in mischief and devastation. And whilst the Lord employs and prospers them in executing his judgments, they grow more intoxicated by success, and more hardened in impiety, infidelity, and idolatry; and thus ripen themselves for destruction.

V. 12—17.

The everlasting and holy Lord God of Israel, though he ordains the basest of men for correction and judgment, continues the invariable Friend of his people; and though he "chasten them sore, he will not give them over unto "death." He is "of purer eyes than to behold iniquity:" and as he will not connive at or countenance the crimes of his worshippers, or even the incongruous walking of true believers, so he cannot possibly approve of the enormous injustice, treachery, cruelty, rapacity, or blasphemy, of his enemies. Yet the transient success of bad men, in devouring those that are more righteous than themselves, often proves a dangerous temptation to believers; and causes them to question, for the time, the truth of their own principles, and to be dissatisfied with their choice and Portion. But this is their infirmity: and prayer for stronger faith and for clearer views of eternal things is their proper remedy. It is lamentably true, that men are like the fishes of the sea, and the ungoverned and animal tribes, which devour each other, and are "made to be taken and destroyed." The havock of the human species by mighty conquerors and cruel tyrants, to enrich and aggrandize themselves, and the constant re-acting of this same bloody tragedy, on one stage after another, all over the earth, through successive generations, with the loud plaudits of the numerous and admiring spectators, form one of the most mortifying reflections imaginable to the pious and humane observer. Yet the Lord hath wise reasons for permitting these things; though he abhors not only the injustice and cruelty of the actors, but also their impiety and self-admiration, whilst they ascribe their greatness and prosperity to their own policy, courage, or good fortune, and rejoice in their fleeting riches and fading glories: and he will soon end their successful and splendid robberies. Death and judgment shall make them cease to prey on others, and they themselves shall be preyed upon. But let us remember, whatever temporal or spiritual advantages we possess, by whatever means, instruments, or endeavours, to give all the glory of them to God, with humble thanksgivings and praises. Thus all things will be sanctified to us, lead our thoughts to the great Source of all felicity, and help to prepare us for the enjoyment of his favour for ever.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1—3. The prophet, having made his complaints and inquiries before God, humbly waited for an answer. He was a watchman, who was appointed to stand in his watch-tower, to give warning of the approach either of enemies or helpers. He would therefore wait upon God with recollection and prayer, expecting further instructions: and he would watch to see what the Lord would say to him, or "in him," by the Spirit of prophecy, that he might know what to answer to the people; who reproved him and contended with him for uttering the terrifying predictions of the foregoing chapter, and who started objections which he knew not how to obviate. Accordingly, the Lord ordered him to write the following vision in large legible characters, upon tables made of wood and covered with wax, (as was customary in those days;) that being hung up in some public place, every one might read it with the utmost facility; and that the Jews might generally get acquainted with it. For it related to interesting events which would not immediately be fulfilled; but for which a time was appointed in the purposes of God. When that period should arrive, the prophecy would speak for itself, proclaiming its divine original by its exact accomplishment: this therefore was to be patiently waited for, though apparently long delayed; for it would infallibly come to pass, and not tarry beyond the prescribed and best time. Some interpret this of the coming of Christ, and render it, He will surely come, &c. (Heb. x. 37, 38.)

When I am, &c. "What I shall answer, as to what "I have argued;" viz. 'to the expostulations I made 'with God just before. God commands the prophet to 'write the contents of this vision, in such visible charac-'ters as were used in public tables, and hung up in 'temples and market-places, that every one might have 'cognizance of them.'

come; he will not go beyond the appointed time, but will make good the promise of deliverance given to our fathers.' (Lowth.)

V. 4. The former part of this verse is generally applied to Nebuchadnezzar, or Belshazzar; whose hearts were exalted in pride and alienated from God, even when they used submissive words respecting him. The Septuagint renders the verse, "If any man draw back, my soul "shall have no pleasure in him: but the just shall live by "his faith." This the apostle quotes, only reversing the order of the two clauses in the verse. (Marg. Ref.) This leads us to consider the proud, unbelieving, and apostate Jews, as well as the Chaldeans. The general principle perhaps may be thus stated, with reference to the state of things in the prophet's time. The proud and hypocritical Jews objected and scoffed at these predictions; as those of whom St. Peter spake did at that of the coming of Christ to destroy his enemies and judge the world. (2 Pet. iii. 3, 4.) They were elated with self-sufficiency, and proud of their privileges: they confided in their own wisdom, strength, or courage: they "trusted in themselves that they "were righteous," and vindicated their conduct against the reproofs of the prophets, and disdained their humiliating messages; their souls, or hearts, were not upright in them; they were unsound and hypocritical, and they drew back, when called to self-denial and trials for conscience' sake. Whereas every righteous person, who was accepted of God and walked by the rule of his word, lived by faith in the mercy, grace, promise, and providence of God, and in the redemption of the predicted Saviour: by this faith he was justified and sanctified, and had both his title to and fitness for eternal life: by this faith he lived unto God, in dependence and submission, expecting all good from him, and devoting himself to his service: not being of "such "as drew back unto perdition, but of those that believed "to the saving of their souls." This discrimination of character, between the proud pharisee and the humble believer is always to be observed; but it was most evident when Christ came, and when his Gospel was first published: and probably the spirit of prophecy intended those future times and events, to which the apostle has applied this passage.

V. 5–8. 'The prophet, having assured the Jews of a deliverance in God's appointed time, proceeds now to denounce his judgment against the Babylonian monarchy, speaking of it as comprised under one person. He describes him as intoxicated with successes, and not knowing how to set any bounds to his ambition.' (Lowth.) —It is probable that the kings of Babylon, (as well as their subjects,) indulged to a great excess of riot; and inflamed their passions by intoxication for the execution of their destructive projects. Nebuchadnezzar was a very proud ambitious man, intoxicated by greatness and prosperity: he was not satisfied with his paternal dominions; but his lust of dominion and his ambitious views expanded, till he became insatiable as hell and death, or the grave; and he wanted to gather to him all nations, to aggrandize himself by extending his authority, to increase his revenues, and to acquire a greater measure of fame among men. But his overgrown empire would speedily be subverted: all the nations, which he or his successors had conquered and oppressed, would at length insult over his fallen family and empire, with taunting proverbs; they would denounce woes upon him, for seizing upon those countries that did not belong to him; and inquire scoffingly how long he had held them? and they would ridicule and reprobate him, for loading himself with thick clay; or with those ill-gotten dominions and treasures, which would only pollute, burden, and encumber him, without being of any real use to him or his family. For the Medes and Persians would soon rise up to perplex and harass the kings of Babylon, whose great wealth and extensive empire would render them the richer booty for them. As they had spoiled many nations, a remnant of these very people would join their enemies in spoiling them; to avenge the innocent blood which they had shed, and especially the violence done to the land of Judah, the city of Jerusalem, and the Jews. It is obvious, that all this may be applied both to the temporal conquests, dominion, and tyranny of Pagan Rome, and her persecution of the primitive Christians, and to the ruin of that overgrown empire: and also to the spiritual pride and ambition, the insatiable thirst of dominion, the tyranny, cruelty, and persecution of Papal Rome; and to the expected event of that usurpation, and the ruin of that city which hath been the seat of it, whether these events were intended in the predic[illegible] or not.

V. 9—11. The king of Babylon aimed to exalt his family to such power and greatness, that they might be out of the reach of their enemies, and have nothing to fear from any rival; (as the eagle's lofty nest is the security of her young;) but this covetousness or rapacity prompted him to use most iniquitous, oppressive, and cruel methods of aggrandizing himself, which proved ruinous to his posterity; both by rendering him the object of the hatred and envy of his neighbours, and by exposing him to the righteous judgment of God. Thus by cutting off many people he ensured disgrace to his family, even as if he had consulted how to shame them: and he brought guilt upon himself, as if he had intended to destroy his own life or soul. For if other witnesses of his guilt should be wanting, or men should not dare to give in their evidence, the very stones and timber of the city and palaces, which he had erected with the spoils of the oppressed nations, would concur in crying to God for vengeance upon him, and in testifying his guilt. The temporal effects of Nebuchadnezzar's oppressions on his kingdom and family, which were speedily to be ruined by the Medes and Persians, were here predicted: but we cannot draw any conclusion from it, as to the state of his soul; for it is probable that he repented and obtained forgiveness. 'The stones of the 'house shall cry, and say that they are built of blood; and 'the wood shall answer and say the same of itself.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12—14. Nebuchadnezzar was very proud of great Babylon, which he had builded for himself: but this work was performed at the expense of immense bloodshed, and the iniquity thus contracted brought down the wrath of God on his posterity. He had exposed himself and his soldiers to vast fatigue, hardship, and peril, in his wars: and he had wearied his subjects and vassals, as if they had laboured in the fire, whilst they builded the walls, castles, temples, and palaces of Babylon: and all this was in fact for very vanity. For that city would soon be taken by the Medes and Persians; the monarchy and royal family would be ruined, the seat of empire removed, and Babylon itself at length entirely destroyed. Indeed, it was the righteous purpose of God, to permit the Chaldeans and their associates to be thus harassed and wearied, in order to punish their idolatry, and their oppression of his worshippers; and he intended to destroy that city, in order to show his glory to the whole earth, by redeeming Israel and replenishing Jerusalem; that there the Redeemer might appear, and that his Gospel might spread from thence, to fill the earth with the knowledge of the glorious perfections, truth, and salvation of the Lord; with the worship of his name, and obedience to his will, even as the waters deeply and entirely overspread the whole channel of the seas.—This universal spread of the Gospel will follow the ruin of the New-Testament Babylon; that city, which hath been builded with blood and iniquity, and where the people have been left to labour in the fire, and to weary themselves for the veriest vanities, in idolatries, superstitions, will-worship, and fruitless efforts to preserve an usurped authority. It is therefore evident that these events also were intended.—'God's providence in governing the world shall con-'spicuously appear in the downfal of the Babylonian 'empire; especially as it is described by the prophets, as 'an earnest and type of the fall of mystical Babylon, 'which will be a decisive stroke, that will thoroughly vin-'dicate oppressed truth and innocence.' (Lowth.)

V. 15—17. Probably the Chaldeans were exceedingly prone to drunkenness, and delighted in tempting each other, or strangers, to that vice; giving them liquor, and pressing them to drink to excess of it, in order that they might over-reach them when intoxicated, or discover and expose their infirmities and faults. For this, a wo was denounced against them, that they should be exposed to shame, instead of retaining their present honour and reputation; that they would be left to drink to excess, and to expose themselves as uncircumcised idolaters; which Belshazzar did at his feast;) and that then the Lord would put his cup of wrath into their hands, intoxicate them with his judgments, and leave them to defile their magnificence, according to the loathsome behaviour of drunken men. But the same image is elsewhere used for tempting others to idolatry or other iniquity, or rendering them miserable.—

18 ¶ What [t] profiteth the graven-image that the maker thereof hath graven it; the molten-image, and [u] a teacher of lies, [x] that the * maker of his work trusteth therein, to [y] make dumb idols?

19 Woe unto him [z] that saith to the wood, Awake; to the dumb stone, Arise, it shall teach! Behold, [a] it is laid over with gold and silver, and there is no breath at all in the midst of it.

20 But [b] the LORD is in his holy temple: † let all the earth keep silence before him.

(Marg. Ref.) It may therefore predict the pains, which the king and people of Babylon would take to tempt the nations, especially the Jews, to idolatry, or to debase them by oppression; and the judgments of God upon them for it; in which they typified the church of Rome, the great seducer of Christians to idolatry and superstition, and the persecutor of the Church, which shall soon receive its righteous retribution. The Chaldeans would thus be punished "for the violence of Lebanon," that is, say some, 'for 'the violence done to the temple built of cedars of Leba-'non;' or for the ravages committed near that mountain; or rather for the cruelties, by which they resembled the wild beasts which frequented it. "Therefore the spoil of "beasts shall make them afraid;" 'as thou hast spoiled 'others, without any sense of common humanity: so the 'army of the conqueror shall deal with thee, and shall 'tear thee in pieces as wild beasts do their prey,' (Lowth.) and "the spoil of beasts," &c. or as men pursue and destroy beasts of prey upon the mountains, who have made them afraid by their depredations. They would suffer for men's blood that they had shed, and for the violence done to Judah, Jerusalem, and the Jews.

Cup. 'Grotius justly observes that the fifteenth and 'sixteenth verses contain an allegory. The Chaldeans 'gave to the neighbouring nations the cup of idolatry, and 'deceitful alliance; and in return they received from 'JEHOVAH the cup of his fury.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 18, 19. The idols of Babylon could not profit their makers: they were teachers of lies, leading men to false conceptions of God and the nature of his worship; their oracles, as interpreted by the priests, were unprofitable and pernicious lies; and the whole deluded men into an absurd confidence in a dumb idol, the work of their own hands. A wo was therefore denounced against those who continued so stupid and perverse, as to say to a log of wood, or block of marble, formed into any shape, by the saw, plane, or chisel, "Awake, arise, come, help, teach, "counsel us;" when, though it was overlaid with gold and silver, and appeared very splendid, yet being lifeless, it was actually inferior to the meanest reptile. This is certainly applicable to the idolatry of the New Testament-Babylon. For her example, influence, and authority, diffused the worship of angels, saints, and images, throughout the Christian Church, which hath continued in many places to this day; and probably will do, till that city shall be destroyed, and "swept with the besom of destruction," as ancient Babylon hath been.

V. 20. Opposed to these false and imaginary objects of worship, JEHOVAH was here revealed, as dwelling in his sanctuary among his people; that is, in Christ, in his Church, and amidst his worshippers, in heaven and earth. 'The true God has his throne in heaven,—whence he 'will answer the prayers of his servants, though the 'temple at Jerusalem should be destroyed.' (Lowth.) He is the sovereign Lord of all, to whom all worship, honour, and obedience are due: let all the earth keep silence before him, not daring to oppose his truth or provoke his wrath; but submitting quietly to his rebuke, humbly adoring his perfections, accepting of his salvation, and obeying his will, without objecting, murmuring, or disputing. 'It 'alludes to such a silence as is kept in courts of justice, 'when a judge pronounces the sentence.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When we have presented our prayers before God, we should expect and wait for an answer; using every means of information, and watching the course of providence; that we may learn his will, and how to answer those who cavil, object, or revile our confidence in him, and our belief of his word. Ministers also must wait upon God, to know how to answer their opposers; as well as watch for opportunities of usefulness. It behooves them to render their important message as plain and energetic as possible; that it may be level to the capacity of the most unlearned, and may excite the attention of the most heedless. For all men are concerned in the truths of God's word: all his predictions, promises, and threatenings, shall in the appointed season be accomplished; every part shall then declare its own truth and divinity; and they, who wait for the Lord, will not complain of having waited in vain. We should rest on and plead his promises; and though the performance of them tarry, we should "hope unto the "end;" and we shall thus experience their truth and preciousness. But pride objects to this method of seeking happiness, and to the whole system of revealed religion: the ambitious, self-wise, and self-sufficient are not, and cannot be, upright in heart in their religious inquiries and professions; and by rejecting and despising the "right-"teousness of God by faith," they evince their insincerity. The humble broken-hearted sinner alone believes this report; he submits to God; he fears, hopes, waits, prays, and uses every means of obtaining an interest in this free salvation. He rests his soul on the promise, and on Christ, through whom it is given: thus he obtains righteousness and strength, wisdom and grace; he walks and works, as well as lives, by faith; perseveres unto the end, and is exalted to glory, whilst proud pharisees and hypocrites are debased unto hell. But in what varied ways does human depravity break forth! A vain exorbitant ambition disposes men to despise the most eligible situations, and to rove from home in quest of happiness: success only enlarges their desires, and renders them insatiable and boundless; and the wretched slaves of them would be as far from felicity as ever, could they obtain the whole earth for their possession. Thus they multiply crimes, enemies, and dangers: they fall under the wo denounced against those who "increase that which is not theirs;" and their short-lived encumbrance defiles their souls, and excites others to rise up, vex, and make a booty of them, in their turn; and to avenge on them the blood that they have shed.

V. 9—20.

In vain do men expect, by "an evil covetousness," to advance their families and secure them from the power of evil: they only treasure up guilt and shame for them; and every part of their treasures amassed by fraud or violence, will cry out for vengeance on them. For were a man thus to build a city or erect a kingdom for his posterity, he would leave them a curse instead of a blessing: and he in acquiring, and they in attempting to preserve it, would labour in the fire, and weary themselves for very vanity. For the Lord will assuredly glorify himself before all the inhabitants of the earth, in executing judgment upon the murderers and plunderers of mankind, under whatever specious guise they make their appearance. Nor can sensual pleasures do more for men's happiness than avarice or ambition: whilst they transgress by wine, and tempt others to that degrading vice, and glory in making their neighbours drunken also, that they may cheat or deride them; they forget, that God hath denounced a wo upon them, and that the cup of his wrath is about to be put into their hands, which will turn all their mirth into howling, and all their glory into contempt. Indeed, all who seduce others into any kind of carnal or spiritual wickedness, to gratify their own vile passions or interests, will meet with the severest condemnation from the Lord. Nor can idols, superstitions, or teachers of lies, of whatever description, profit any man, or render him profitable to others. Wo be to all who inculcate or countenance such human inventions or diabolical delusions! nay, to those, who are deluded to give that glory to a dumb idol, or to any creature, which our jealous God claimeth wholly to himself! He dwelleth in his holy temple; may we, may all the inhabitants of the earth, fall down before him, welcome his salvation, and worship him through Christ Jesus, and by the influences of his Spirit! Thus we shall shun these vices and delusions, seek durable honours, riches, and pleasures, and employ all our powers to glorify our God and Saviour.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. "A prayer of Habakkuk the "prophet, with an Ode." (Sept.) 'Shigionoth may 'denote a musical instrument of great compass, with 'which the Jews accompanied this piece of poetry.' (Bp. Newcombe.) (Marg. Ref.) The word prayer seems to be taken generally for an act of devotion to God.

V. 2. The prophet had hearkened attentively to the discovery, which the Lord had made to him of his future dealings with Israel: and though heavy judgments had been denounced on their oppressors, and intimations of future deliverances had been given, yet there was no reason to hope that the threatened judgments on Israel might be averted or retarded. He was therefore alarmed at the prospect of the captivity; and prayed that God would revive his work among them in the midst of those years of adversity, and make known his glorious perfections and his favour for his people, by preserving them, and purifying them in this furnace of affliction, that they might be prepared for deliverance from it; and that even in the midst of his wrath against them he would remember mercy also, and give them some mitigation of their calamities, and revive true religion among them. This seems primarily to refer to the years of the Babylonish captivity, though it may be applied to the years that were to intervene before the coming of the Messiah; to those of the antichristian oppressors of the Church; or to any other season when the Church is under divine rebukes or grievous afflictions.

V. 3—5. The prophet, (to encourage his hope of effectual help from God in behalf of the people,) set himself to celebrate the praises of his former interpositions in their behalf. As Israel's "Holy One," the Object of their worship, and their righteous Ruler and Protector, he had come from Teman, or mount Seir, and from Paran, to deliver Israel from Egypt, and to meet them on mount Sinai. He had sent Moses from that quarter, and his visible glory seemed to come from thence. Then the firmament was illuminated by the displays of his Majesty; he was adored by all the angels of heaven, and the praise of his wonders rang through all the earth. The brightness of his glory was conspicuous and resplendent as the light: "he had horns coming out of his hand," an emblem of the power which he exerted, to defend Israel and scatter their enemies: or, as it may be rendered, "bright beams "came forth from his side." 'The verb, whence the 'word here used is derived, signifies to shine, Ex. xxxiv. '28, 29. 35; and a pencil, or cone, of rays, issuing 'from a point, diverges in the shape of a horn.' (Note, Ex. xxxiv. 29—35.) 'In the place whence the light 'proceeded, he gloriously concealed his presence. Ca-'pellus understands the verse of the lightning on mount 'Sinai: but I rather refer it to the brightness, which 'occasionally issued from the Shechinah. The Israelites 'were consumed by a fire, which went out from JEHOVAH. '—The burnt-offering was consumed by a fire, which 'came out from before him.' (Bp. Newcombe.) (Notes, Lev. ix. 24. x. 1, 2. Marg. Ref.) All this, however, was rather the hiding than the discovery of his almighty power: or, the hiding-place of his power, under which Israel was safely sheltered. Pestilences and fire marched before him and attended his steps, when he passed through Egypt, to destroy the first-born and desolate the land; when he appeared to the people from the top of Sinai; when he destroyed the rebels from among them, and when he marched before them to subdue the Amalekites, Amorites, Midianites, and other enemies. 'This is a sudden 'burst of poetry, in the true spirit of the ode; the con-'cealed connexion being, that God, who had formerly 'displayed such power in delivering the Israelites from 'Egyptian slavery, might succour their posterity in a like 'wonderful manner; and the enthusiasm of the poet lead-'ing him to neglect all obvious ways of entering on his 'subject.' (Bp. Lowth.) 'The grandest circumstances 'are selected, the diction is as splendid as the subject.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 6. The God of Israel stood and measured out Canaan, and allotted it for the inheritance of their tribes; as he had divided the whole earth among the nations. He dispersed the power of Egypt, which would have hindered Israel's departure to the promised inheritance; he destroyed the confederated nations of Canaan, that would have prevented them from taking possession of it. The whole creation seemed to be thrown into convulsions at the presence of Israel's God: Sinai and Horeb shook and quaked; and the most formidable and powerful opposers, (which were as the mountains and hills, that have kept their places from the creation,) were driven away as chaff, or made to bow down in subjection to his people. (Marg. Ref.) 'The mountains and hills are spoken of as em-'blems of eternity, because time seems to make no change 'in them. His ways, &c. His purposes are decreed 'from eternity, and will infallibly be executed in the ap-'pointed time.' (Lowth.)

V. 7. The prophet, in his vision, saw the consternation and distress of the Ethiopians, Arabians, Midianites, Moabites, Ammonites, and others who inhabited the adjacent regions; whilst they heard of the wonders wrought by JEHOVAH in delivering Israel; whilst they witnessed the convulsions of nature around them; whilst they learned how the Amalekites, and Sihon and Og, had been destroyed by Israel; and when they found themselves attacked by the same terrible enemies. (Marg. Ref.) Several of these tribes dwelt in tents, or within curtains.

V. 8. The Lord was not displeased with the rivers or the sea, when he turned the waters of the Nile into blood, or when he divided those of the Red Sea and of Jordan: but he came, as in haste, to deliver Israel, attended by his holy angels, with his horses and chariots of salvation: and love to his people caused him thus to alter the course of nature, for their deliverance and prosperity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. 'The question asked, in a very bold and 'poetical manner, in the eighth verse, is answered in the 'ninth; that God displayed his power to deliver his people, 'according to his faithful word.' (Bp. Newcombe.) (Marg. Ref.) The Lord appeared as a mighty warrior, to fight for Israel, and made his bow, (here put for all the weapons of war,) quite naked, as openly prepared for the assault. This accorded to his oath and word of promise, to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in behalf of their descendants the tribes of Israel, to give them the land of Canaan. Therefore the Lord "did cleave," or divide, "the rivers of the "earth," to open them a passage to their promised inheritance: and the mountains, as if conscious of JEHOVAH's presence with his people, trembled and quaked. The overflowing waters of the Red Sea, or of Jordan, removed, to make way for them; and being piled up as walls or mountains, they seemed to celebrate the praises of their Creator's power, and to lift up their hands in admiration and adoration of him. A most emphatic, sublime, and bold poetical figure! Some, however, understand the last clause in the ninth verse, of the rivers of waters miraculously flowing from the rock, when smitten by the rod of Moses, and following the camp of Israel during their wanderings in the wilderness.

V. 11. The sacred poet and prophet, in the midst of his rapturous praises, cannot be supposed to have attended to exactness of method. He therefore suddenly passed from the power of God displayed in dividing the sea and Jordan, to that shown when the sun and moon were stayed in their course, whilst Joshua was fighting with the Canaanites. They stood still in their tabernacle, the firmament of heaven. They stopped, and again moved, they shone, and then set, as best coincided with the Lord's plan when he fought for Israel: for his arrows and "the "lightning of his spear," his manifested power, truth, and love to his people, shone so bright as to eclipse their feeble beams.

V. 12, 13. The Lord, at that time, and frequently in after ages, marched through the land of Canaan in indignation, to crush and scatter its heathen inhabitants, and to deliver his people from their oppressions. Thus he rescued them by the judges; and at length by David his anointed, all whose victories were typical of Christ's salvation. At those times he wounded the head, or the chief persons in the families of these wicked enemies of Israel: he subverted their power and prosperity, as a building that is razed to the foundation; or he wounded them mortally, as when the head is cloven down to the neck. Some, however, interpret these verses of preceding events. 'The 'ardour of the prophet having led him to begin in the 'midst of his subject, (3) he here returns to what passed 'in Egypt before the dividing of the Red Sea; the mention 'of which astonishing miracle he repeats, (15.) "Out "of the house," 'Or so that there should be no house: 'the prophet refers to the destruction of the first-born; '—this is figuratively called the utter overthrow of the 'Egyptian houses.' (Bp. Newcombe.) Moses, Aaron, Joshua, &c. being especially appointed by God to their distinct services, may be included among his anointed. (Marg. Ref.) As the Egyptians had craftily attempted to crush the enslaved Israelites, by destroying their male children; so God crushed Egypt, by destroying the first-born. And when Pharaoh had consented to Israel's departure, hearing afterwards that they were entangled in the country, he craftily attempted to come on them unawares, when unarmed or unable to resist or flee, that he might glut his revenge in their destruction: but he fell a victim, with all his forces, to his own malicious and insidious policy. (Marg. Ref.) 'The Egyptians rapidly followed the 'Israelites; and in imagination devoured a defenceless 'people.' (Bp. Newcombe.) Nothing similar to this occurred after Israel had entered Canaan; though some expositors understand the passage of their triumphs over the Canaanites.

V. 14, 15. The Lord, by those instruments that he employed for the deliverance of his people, effectually smote through the heads of the cities and villages of Egypt. They came out furiously as a whirlwind to scatter Israel, rejoicing to afflict and oppress them, either by open violence, or by secret machinations: but JEHOVAH marched before his poor people through the Red Sea, as with his horses and chariots of war; and having guarded them through the heap of mighty waters, he overwhelmed and destroyed their pursuers, by the reflux of the sea into its former channel.

V. 16. This refers to what the prophet had heard of the Chaldean invasion, which had thrown him into the greatest agitation. His body trembled and was convulsed; his voice faltered; his bones were in pain and weakness, as if decayed through disease; and he trembled in the inmost recesses of his heart; anxiously inquiring, what refuge he could flee to, or what means he could use, to be safe and at rest in the approaching day of trouble, when the king of Babylon would come up, and invade, or cut in pieces, the people with his troops. 'I shall rest secure 'under the divine protection, when the Chaldeans shall 'come to invade Judea.' (Lowth.) Some expositors suppose, that the calamities and deliverances which the prophet foresaw were those of the Christian Church, as well as those of the Jews.

V. 17—19. The prophet foresaw, that the Chaldeans would utterly desolate the land, and render the vineyards, olive-yards, orchards, fields, and pastures, entirely unproductive; that every outward comfort would fail, and that the extremity of distress and hardship must be endured. And perhaps he also understood, that all the ordinances of God's house, and other means of grace and of divine consolation, would be suspended. Yet, by meditation, prayer, and praise, composing his mind, he was enabled to exercise faith and hope in God; he had those views of his power, truth, love to his people, and all-sufficiency for their happiness in life and death, and for ever, that he was determined to rejoice in him and his salvation, in all possible circumstances. The Lord God, his Strength, his Support, Protector, and Comforter, was able to make up all losses, to supply all wants, and to rejoice his heart under all afflictions. He would make his feet as those of the hind or hart, that he might walk safely on the brink of the most tremendous precipices, or climb on high places out of the reach of his pursuers; or that he might live in the enjoyment of his exalted privileges, and the hope of a most glorious inheritance; notwithstanding all difficulties, temptations, and dangers. This song of praise and believing prayer, he dedicated to the chief singer at the temple, to be set to music on some stringed instruments, which he had chosen or provided for that purpose. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

Whatever causes us to fear or grieve, should remind us to pray; whether it be a message from God's word, or a dispensation of his providence; whether it respect ourselves, or the Church, or those with whom we stand connected. If we fear, or grieve, that the work of God in our hearts, families, or congregations, declines, we should pray the more earnestly that the Lord would revive it in the midst of the years of our pilgrimage; that he would subdue our iniquities, increase our faith and love, convert sinners, and cause believers to be zealous, diligent, and fruitful. Even when we suffer the fatherly corrections of our God, we should hope and pray that in wrath he would remember mercy, and that we may be supported under our trials, and profited by them. We shall see no cause for despondency, either in our own case, or in that of the Church, when we remember the ancient wonders of his love to his people. The displays of his power, truth, and mercy, to Israel, and of righteous severity upon his enemies, were very resplendent, and his glory covered the heavens and the earth. How then have they been filled with the brightness of his light, displayed in the great redemption of his Son! The Majesty that shone from mount Sinai, at the Red Sea, in the wilderness, at the river Jordan, and in Canaan, (whilst the mountains saw and trembled, the deep adored, and the sun and moon stood still, as in amazement at their Creator's power, when he rode on his horses and chariots of salvation,) was great, and worthy to be praised: yet was it eclipsed by the harmonious discovery of the divine perfections which was made, when the Son of God suffered on the cross for the sins of his rebellious creatures. Then the sun was darkened, the rocks were cleft, the graves were opened, the veil of the temple was rent; and all creatures seemed to share in the astonishment and consternation, except the hardened priests, scribes, and pharisees! How glorious also was that display, when the earth quaked, and angels descended, to attend upon the resurrection of their crucified Lord! when the Holy Ghost came down from heaven on the assembled apostles, to testify his glorious ascension and exaltation at the right hand of the Father! and when he came in holy majesty and power to avenge himself on his crucifiers, to destroy Jerusalem, and to erect his kingdom on the ruins of that abrogated dispensation; and again to terminate the persecutions of his pagan enemies, by subverting the Roman empire! Great and glorious have been the works of our God for his Church; yet not only history, but prophecy, causes us to meditate terror, when we consider the intimations that are given of various severe conflicts, which his people must sustain with many antichrists.

V. 17—19.

In respect of the troubles which may befal us, however we may be impoverished, tempted, despised, persecuted, or afflicted, in life or death, we should seriously and frequently consider, how we may rest in the day of trouble. And if our fears lead us to abound in prayer and meditation, and in praising God for his former mercies to us or to his Church; if we are led to live wholly by faith in him, as the God of our salvation, and to "exercise ourselves to have a conscience void of offence, "towards him and all men;" we shall find hope prevail. And as we shall have cause for rejoicing in every tribulation or peril, we shall be generally enabled to rejoice: we shall find our hearts assured of support and comfort by the way, and of finishing our course happily; and then other things will less move us: and whatever fail us, or be taken from or laid upon us, we may and ought to rejoice in our all-sufficient and eternal Portion. As he is the Strength, as well as Salvation, of his people, he will fit us for our warfare and our trials; he will carry us above, out of the reach of our enemies, and he will bring us to tread on our high places in his holy habitation in heaven, and to join the songs of those chief singers, who are now celebrating the praises of God and the Lamb. In hopes of this immortal crown, let us sit loose to earthly possessions and comforts, and let us cheerfully bear up under our crosses: for yet "a little while, and he that shall come, will come, "and will not tarry;" and he will "take us to himself, "that where he is, there we may be also."

BOOK OF ZEPHANIAH.

It is probable that Zephaniah delivered these prophecies towards the close of Josiah's reign, when religion was greatly declined in Judah, through the hypocrisy of those who had concurred in the reformation of that pious king. He was contemporary with Jeremiah, in the first years of that prophet; and often uses the same language. He severely reproved the wickedness of the Jews, and predicted the Chaldean invasion and its fatal effects: he exhorted the people to repent and seek the Lord, as the only method of escaping ruin, personal and public; he foretold various judgments, that were coming on those nations, which inflicted, or rejoiced over the miseries of the Jews; and he concluded with most animating predictions of evangelical times, and of great prosperity to the Church. These predictions entirely accord with many which have been considered: and it is certain that this prophecy formed a part of the sacred Scriptures, in the days of Christ and his apostles, though no express quotation is made from it in the New Testament.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. Hizkiah. The letters of this name are the same with those of Hezekiah; and some have thought that this prophet was descended from that pious king. But it does not appear that he had any son except Manasseh; and there was not 'a sufficient distance of 'time between Hezekiah and Zephaniah, for four de-'scents.' (Lowth.)

V. 3. These are figurative representations of desolating judgments. Neither the fowls of the air nor the fishes of the sea would profit the Jews; and this would be equivalent to their being destroyed. Their idols were stumbling-blocks, the occasion to the people of falling into sin and misery: but in mercy they would be destroyed, with their obstinate worshippers; and accordingly that nation no more relapsed into gross idolatry after the captivity.

V. 4. A remnant of Baal's worshippers remained in Jerusalem, notwithstanding all Josiah's efforts to destroy that idolatry; but the Lord by the Chaldeans finally extirpated it. The Chemarims, or the black ones, were an order of idolatrous priests or devotees to Baal, who perhaps wore black garments, or painted their faces black. (Marg. Ref.) 'The Chemarim were an order of super-'stitious priests, appointed to minister in the service 'of Baal, and were as his peculiar chaplains.' 'I 'will destroy these, together with the priests of the tribe 'of Levi, who have joined in the worship of idols.' (Lowth.)

V. 5. 'They join the worship of idols to that of the 'true God, who is a jealous God, and will not admit of 'any rival. Malcham is the same with Moloch, to whom 'the people continued to offer their children, notwith-'standing the reformation that Josiah had made. Swear-'ing is an act of religious worship, or a solemn invocation 'of God, as a Witness or Judge, and therefore expressly 'forbid to be used to idols.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. Some had concurred in Josiah's reformation, who afterwards relapsed into idolatry; and they would be punished with those that had never professed to seek and serve him. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7, 8. The people were ordered to keep silence, and not murmur or object to the execution that was to take place in the approaching day of the Lord; for the slaughter of the wicked would be a sacrifice to his justice, which he had invited the Chaldeans and their confederates to feast upon. 'This alludes to the custom of those that 'offered sacrifice, which was to invite their friends to 'partake of the feast which accompanied it.' (Lowth.) In that day the princes and even the king's children would be punished. For though Josiah set his sons a good example, and doubtless gave them good instructions; yet they were very wicked, and shared abundantly in the public calamities. Jehoahaz died a captive in Egypt; Jehoiakim by a violent death; and Zedekiah having seen his sons slaughtered, and his eyes put out, was carried to Babylon, and died there. Such of the Jews also would be punished, as were weary of the dress of their country, and clothed themselves with the strange apparel of idolaters, as desirous of being in all respects conformed to them. 'The text may likewise be explained of such 'men as wore women's apparel, and such women as wore 'that belonging to men; which was contrary to an ex-'press law, and was a rite observed in the worship of 'some idols.' (Lowth.) (Note, Deut. xxii. 5.) 'The 'courtiers did imitate the strange apparel of other nations, 'to win their favour thereby, and to appear glorious in the 'eyes of all others.'

V. 9. The servants of the oppressive princes and nobles exulted, in forcing their way into the houses of the oppressed; leaping for joy, when they passed over the thresholds, that they might convey the plunder into their master's houses, for which they doubtless were liberally rewarded. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. A cry, &c. That is, of the enemy rushing into the city at different gates and in different quarters, on the people, from the hills; and a howling of the people, as terrified or slaughtered by them.

V. 11. Maktesh. 'The lower city.' This is agree-'able to the etymology of the word, which signifies a 'hollow place, or a mortar.' (Bp. Newcombe.) (Prov. xxvii. 22. Heb.) 'This is meant of the street of the 'merchants, which was lower than the rest of the place 'about it.'

Bearers of silver. 'The rich merchants in general, or 'the money-changers in particular.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 12. The Lord determined to detect, expose, and punish those secret idolatries, iniquities, and impieties, which had escaped all human observation. He would search every retired corner; as men search with candles for stolen goods: and no concealed abominations would then escape conviction or punishment. Or, 'No corner would 'escape the Chaldeans, who should diligently search the 'houses, and plunder the wealth of them.' They especially would be punished, who were become daring through long continued impunity and prosperity; as wine grows stronger and more heady when it hath long settled on the lees; who had run into infidelity or atheism, and despised alike the promises and threatenings of God, saying, in their hearts, that he would neither do good to his worshippers, nor punish his enemies. 'The thoughtless tranquillity of 'the rich is compared to the fixed unbroken surface of 'fermented liquors.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The servants of God are all of one mind, and with one voice proclaim that "there is no peace for the wicked."—How soon doth human depravity subvert all that man can do to revive true religion! Even where a decent exterior excites our favourable judgment, the Lord often sees such abominations as call for his severest vengeance. If the materials and occasions of sin shall perish with the wicked; how much more will the tempters, who seduce men to iniquity! When professors of true religion copy the crimes of the heathen, they must expect severer punishment than they. Vain are all endeavours to worship God and idols, to serve God and Mammon: and apostacy evinces hypocrisy, as neglect of God shows impiety and contempt: "for if any man draw back, the Lord will have "no pleasure in him." May we "none of us be of "those that draw back unto perdition, but of them that "believe to the saving of the soul!" It will be unavailing in the day of the Lord, for sinners to object, cavil, or complain; nay, his presence will certainly stop their mouths: for it will appear that they who perish fall a sacrifice to his justice, for breaking his law, and because they have no interest by faith in the Redeemer's atoning blood. That day of God, (of which all temporal judgments are earnests,) will soon arrive; and then neither pious nor royal parents will prove any security to their ungodly children: nay, the children of kings and of saints, who have abused their peculiar privileges, will experience the deepest condemnation. Then various instances of vanity and conformity to the world will be adduced as proofs of men's pride and carnality, which now are deemed trivial or justifiable: and oppressors, and their agents, will be reckoned with for their ill-gotten treasures. Then there will be cries and howlings from every quarter, and among men of all descriptions. Then covetous and fraudulent merchants and traders will forget their gainful projects; and plausible hypocrites will be exposed in their secret iniquities. Then daring infidels, who have settled on their lees, and equally despised the favour and defied the wrath of God, will cry to the rocks to fall on them, and hide them from his intolerable frown. In short, in that time of wrath, of trouble and distress, neither men's silver nor their gold will be able to deliver them; but the whole will be consumed with the fire of the Lord's indignation. "What is a man profited, if he gain the "whole world, and lose his own soul? And what shall a "man give in exchange for his soul?" Let us then "flee "from the wrath to come," and "choose that good part, "that shall never be taken from us:" then we shall be prepared for every event; and nothing "shall separate us "from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our "Lord."

3 [f] Seek ye the LORD, [g] all ye meek of the earth, which have wrought his judgment; [h] seek righteousness, seek meekness: [i] it may be ye shall be [k] hid in the day of the LORD's anger.

4 ¶ For [l] Gaza shall be forsaken, and Ashkelon a desolation: they shall drive out Ashdod [m] at the noon-day, and Ekron shall be rooted up.

5 Woe unto the inhabitants of the sea-coasts, the nation of the [n] Cherethites! [o] the word of the LORD is against you; [p] O Canaan, the land of the Philistines, I will even destroy thee, that there shall be no inhabitant.

6 And [q] the sea-coast shall be dwellings and cottages for shepherds, and folds for flocks.

7 And [r] the coast shall be for [s] the remnant of the house of Judah; they shall feed thereupon: in the houses of Ashkelon shall they lie down in the evening: * for the LORD their God [t] shall visit them, and [u] turn away their captivity.

8 ¶ I have [x] heard the reproach of Moab, and [y] the revilings of the children of Ammon, whereby they have reproached my people, and magnified themselves against their border.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1—3. This exhortation to repentance plainly intimated, that the preceding denunciations of desolating judgments were absolute, only because the Lord foreknew that the nation would generally continue impenitent. Judah was addressed as "a nation not desired;" God had delighted in his people, but he now no longer desired them; nay, he abhorred their odious crimes. Or it may be rendered, not desirous; that is, wholly careless repecting the favour, or wrath of God. They were, however, ordered to gather together in a solemn assembly, to fast and pray, and humble themselves before God: or, (as some render it,) to examine themselves, that they might discover and repent of their sins. This must be done without delay: for "the decree" or sentence against them, was about "to bring forth" those desolations, which would put it out of their power to assemble. The day allotted them for this purpose, would soon pass; as the chaff driven by the wind: and the fierce anger of God, in the day of his wrath, would speedily overtake them. But if the nation in general still neglected this duty, yet let the remnant of the meek and lowly, the humble, teachable, and peaceable, seek the Lord in fervent prayer. Though they were poor, despised and afflicted; yet they had obeyed his commandments and adhered to his worship; or being truly penitent, they were now disposed to do so. Let them therefore seek his favour, and his justifying and sanctifying righteousness, and endeavour more fully to understand, and keep his commandments. Though they were meek; yet let them seek more meekness, that they might be more humbled, and become more submissive, dependent, and obedient. This might possibly preserve them from sharing in the approaching calamities; or at least they would in this way be prepared for behaving properly, and finding comfort under them, and for deriving benefit from them.

V. 4—7. 'There will be no escaping into the neighbouring countries, such as the Philistines are in particular: for they likewise shall become a prey to the forces of Nebuchadnezzar. The word '(Cherethites)' is 'translated Cretians by the Septuagint. They are supposed to have been a colony removed from Crete to 'Palestine.' 'The sea-coast shall in after-times belong to 'the Jews, who shall possess all the Philistines' country; 'as it appears that they did in the first times of Christianity.' (Acts viii. 26. 40.) (Lowth.) The sea-port towns of the Philistines, and Cherethites, (Note, Ez. xxv. 16.) would be so desolated, that their commerce would cease, and the sea-coast would wholly be occupied by shepherds; until at length it would fall into the hands of the remnant of Judah after the captivity; as it did in the time of the Maccabees. The Lord purposed thus to destroy the enemies of the Jews, and restore his people from captivity: and this information would serve to encourage the repentance and prayers of those who regarded it. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8—10. (Notes, Jer. xlviii. xlix. 1—6. Ezek. xxv. 1—11. Amos i. 13—15. ii. 1—3.) Moab and Ammon would be rendered as desolate as Sodom and Gomorrah, though in another way. These countries would become a barren desert, covered with nettles, or dug up for salt-pits, till at length they would be possessed by the Jews. Some think the conversion of the inhabitants of those regions to Christianity was intended, by the expression, "The remnant of my people shall possess them." 'Judas Maccabæus and his brethren subdued the Ammonites: (1 Mac. 'i. 6:) but this and the seventh verse will receive their 'utmost completion, at the general restoration of the 'Jewish nation.' (Lowth.) 'These nations presumed 'to take from the Jews that country which the Lord had 'given them.'

V. 11. JEHOVAH, by his terrible judgments, intended to destroy the idolatrous inhabitants of these nations, and to famish their gods. These were supposed to feast upon the sacrifices, and they would therefore be made lean when none were offered. The extirpation of pagan idolatry through many nations, by the promulgation of the Gospel in the primitive ages, in part fulfilled this prophecy: yet it will have a more signal accomplishment, when the universal success of Christianity shall destroy all kinds of idolatry; and men shall worship the Lord, every one in his own place all over the earth, even to the most remote isles of the Gentiles; without any occasion to go up to Jerusalem to worship. (Marg. Ref.) 'The 'Jews called all places islands, to which they went by 'sea.' (Lowth.)

V. 12. Ye, &c. (Ezek. xxx. 4—6. 9.) Nebuchadnezzar, by whom these predictions were fulfilled, may be here called the Lord's sword. 'Also ye, Ethiopians, shall 'be with "those that are the slain of my sword;" namely, the Moabites and Ammonites. (Notes, Ez. xxx. 1—9. Marg. Ref.)

V. 13—15. (Notes, Ez. xxxi. Nah. i. ii. iii.) After Nineveh was taken by the kings of Babylon and Media, it went to decay, through the endeavours of the Chaldeans to aggrandize Babylon, until it was at length utterly desolated. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most alarming passages in the word of God encourage sinners to repent and seek his favour: and though none are more hopeless than degenerate professors of true religion; yet they should be exhorted to judge themselves, that they may not be judged of the Lord. Nations under tokens of God's displeasure should gather together to deprecate his vengeance, before it be executed upon them: and whilst life is continued, sinners should be called upon to seek forgiveness, that the sentence recorded in Scripture may not be awarded against them; (Matt. xxv. 41:) otherwise the fierce wrath of the Lord will then drive them as chaff into everlasting punishment. Yet none but the meek of the earth, the contrite, who tremble at God's word, will sincerely seek this salvation. These are poor in spirit, and will hearken to the Lord's teaching, submit to his authority, plead guilty at his mercy-seat, do his will, and trust wholly to his mercy: these will "seek "first his kingdom and his righteousness;" they will long and pray for more humility and meekness; they will be harmless and blameless; and the chief hope of deliverance from national judgments is placed on their prayers and endeavours. But if they fail in this, they will be preserved or comforted under public calamities, and be safe "in the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous "judgment of God." But whilst the worshippers of God are punished for their hypocrisy, or corrected for their benefit, his open enemies have no cause to triumph. The whole word of the Lord is against them, and the sword of his justice shall certainly slay them. He hears their reproaches and revilings, when they calumniate his people, or rejoice over their faults, or speak evil of them for righteousness' sake; or when they magnify themselves against them in their afflictions: and he will assuredly abase the pride of his enemies, and avenge the injuries done to his servants. Carnal security, ambition, luxury, and sensual dissipated mirth, tend to dismay and desperation, whether in cities or individuals. Yet all the desolations of flourishing nations will make way for the subversion of Satan's kingdom of idolatry, impiety, and iniquity; that all men may worship the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. As we, in those remote isles of the heathen, experience the truth of these predictions, let us study to improve our advantages, expecting the performance of every promise, and praying that our Father's name may be hallowed all over the earth.

2 She [b] obeyed not the voice; [c] she received not [*] correction; [d] she trusted not in the LORD; [e] she drew not near to her God.

4 Her prophets are [h] light and treacherous persons: [i] her priests have polluted the sanctuary, they have done violence to the law.

5 The [k] just LORD [l] is in the midst thereof; [m] he will not do iniquity: [†] every morning doth he [n] bring his judgment to light, he faileth not; [o] but the unjust knoweth no shame.

6 I have [p] cut off the nations: [‡] their towers are desolate; I made their streets waste, that none passeth by: their cities are destroyed, so that there is no man, that there is none inhabitant.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—4. The prophet, having shown the judgments of God on the enemies of the Jews, returned to his subject, and proceeded to reprove and condemn that people for their transgressions. Jerusalem was become filthy and polluted; she was gluttonous, luxurious, and infamous, for all kinds of abominable wickedness, especially for oppression and violence. The inhabitants would not obey the voice of God, who spake to them by his word and his prophets; they hardened themselves in iniquity, or gave themselves up to rebellious murmurs and despondency when corrected; they trusted in their strength and allies, and not in the Lord, for protection and safety; and they drew not near to him, in his courts and ordinances, to seek his favour and assistance in their difficulties; but rather turned from him to their idols. Their princes, nobles, and judges were ravenous as lions; or as wolves that prowl abroad in the evening, after having been pinched with hunger all the day; and they seized all they could to lay it by for the future, as the greedy wolf makes havoc of the flock, reserving the bones to be gnawed when he had no longer an opportunity of devouring the prey. 'They devour all presently, and leave not 'so much as the bones to the next day; as the most voracious creatures commonly do.' (Lowth.) Their prophets were superficial declaimers, men of light minds, without knowledge or seriousness: they deceived the people with false doctrines and predictions, and imposed upon them in their secular concerns: and the priests, like Hophni and Phinehas, polluted the temple by their crimes, and wrested the law by their corrupt glosses, that it might not seem to condemn them. This may be understood of the state of Jerusalem, from the death of Josiah to the Babylonish captivity: yet the context rather leads our attention to a subsequent period. The predictions of the former chapter relate to the return of the Jews from captivity, and to events connected with their prosperity after that deliverance; the latter part of this chapter evidently predicts the times of the Gospel; and the character here given of Jerusalem aptly suits the state of things among the Jews, from the birth of Christ to the calamities brought upon them by the Romans. Being filthy and polluted, they hearkened not to the voice of God, by John Baptist, by Christ, and by his apostles; instructions and corrections were unavailing for their reformation; they trusted in themselves, and not in their incarnate Lord, to whom they would not draw near. And the chief priests, elders, scribes, and pharisees, were precisely such blind guides, deceivers, oppressors, and perverters of the law, as are here described. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5—7. The special presence of the just Lord in Jerusalem, by his temple and ordinances, aggravated their guilt. He would do no iniquity, and their crimes would neither receive countenance from his example, nor toleration from his justice. By the continual instructions of his word and prophets, he failed not to make known his judgments to them: yet they continued shameless in their iniquities. This is very applicable to the personal presence of Christ with the Jews, and his daily teaching in the temple, the synagogues, and the streets: neither his holy example, nor his doctrine, could make them ashamed of their crimes. The Lord had also given the Jews warning, as well as wrought deliverance for them, by the desolations that he had made of other nations and their strong holds; not only those of distant countries, but also those of Ephraim and Samaria; expecting, (to speak after the manner of men,) that they would take the alarm, and fear him and receive instruction, that it might not be necessary utterly to destroy Jerusalem, however they were punished with gentle visitations. But instead of repenting, they grew more bent on wickedness, and corrupted all their doings. Thus the Jews, in after ages, grew more and more corrupt amidst all warnings and deliverances; they rose early to crucify Christ and to persecute his followers; and in this manner they filled up the measure of their iniquities.

'so unreclaimably sinful, make account of an heavy day, 'wherein I will arise to execute my vengeance on you.' (Bp. Hall.) 'Notwithstanding these provocations, I 'exhort the godly among you to expect the fulfilling of 'the promises I have made of restoring the Jewish nation 'to my wonted favour, in the latter ages of the world; in 'order to which crisis, I will execute remarkable judg-'ments upon the unbelievers and disobedient. The same 'general summons may be meant which Joel speaks of.' (Joel iii. 2—12.) (Lowth.) "My determination is to "gather the nations, that I may assemble the kingdoms, "to pour upon them mine indignation, even all my fierce "anger; when all the land shall have been devoured with "the fire of my jealousy." When a jealous God had inflicted vengeance on his apostate worshippers, and desolated the promised land, he would proceed to pour out his indignation on all the nations and kingdoms, which rejected him and his salvation. This accords with the general scope of prophecy. (Marg. Ref.) The remnant, who waited for redemption in Israel, were exhorted, amidst the wickedness that they witnessed, and the oppressions they endured, to wait for the Lord. He was about to rise up as a lion to devour his prey; he had determined to gather the nations, that by them he might pour his fierce anger on the wicked Jews; until the whole land should be consumed by the fire of his jealousy against that adulterous generation: and then he would punish those who, influenced by corrupt motives, had been the executioners of his vengeance on his professed worshippers.—This may be interpreted, either of the Chaldeans and their allies, the Romans and their tributaries, or the antichristian nations that have so long supported the cause of idolatry, superstition, and persecution.

V. 9, 10. These verses predict the purifying and enlarging of the church, by the preaching of the Gospel, about the time when vengeance would be executed on the Jewish nation. Then "the LORD would turn to the "people," or peoples, (the original is plural,) "a pure "language;" which may signify either the pure and purifying doctrine of the Gospel; or the language which the grace of the Lord would then teach them to use. He would bring men acquainted with the language of humility, repentance, faith, spiritual knowledge, and wisdom, sincerity, purity, and love. He would teach them to speak of him and to him as they ought to speak; in order that they might all call upon, and serve, him with harmony and cordial unity of mind and mouth. For he would bring from the remote regions, beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, humble suppliants to his grace, who would be acknowledged as the children of his dispersed church, and who would offer to him spiritual srcrifices with acceptance. Doubtless this predicted the conversion of the Gentiles to Christ, as well as the happy effect of the Gospel on the believing Jews: and the conversion of the Ethiopian eunuch, with the effects of his preaching in his own country, may be considered as one instance of its literal accomplishment. (Marg. Ref.) 'Lest any should 'think that God's glory should have perished when Judah 'was destroyed, he showeth that he will publish his grace 'throughout the world.' 'The Jews shall come as well 'as the Gentiles; which is to be understood under the 'time of the Gospel.' 'This is a blessing reserved for 'the latter ages, after the conversion of the Jews, and the 'coming in of the fulness of the Gentiles; when there "shall be one Lord, and his name one."

One consent. 'The metaphor is taken from beasts 'drawing together under one yoke; or men setting their 'shoulders together to carry the same burden.' (Lowth.)

V. 11—13. When this new dispensation should be introduced, and this new people formed of the converted Jews and Gentiles incorporated together, the Church would no more be ashamed for her sins. This does not mean, that believers would not be ashamed in a penitent manner; but that the reproach and punishment of all the former sins of the Jewish nation would rest on the unbelievers, and not on the Christian Church; and that all the sins of individuals would be repented of, atoned for, blotted out, and buried in oblivion. The Lord would at that time thoroughly separate from among them the pharisees and hypocrites, who gloried in their pride, in their relation to Abraham, external privileges, superstitious observance of their own traditions, or their self-righteous attention to the letter of the ritual or moral law. For the true Israel should no more be haughty on account of mount Zion, the temple, and the sacrifices there offered. These would utterly be destroyed and terminated by the Romans, and true Christians would only glory in the cross of Christ. The Church would indeed be left in an afflicted and persecuted condition, and consist chiefly of poor persons; they would all be humble, meek, and lowly, or poor in spirit; and would know, that they had nothing to trust to, but the Lord, and his mercy, truth, and power. They would therefore be a chosen remnant of genuine Israelites, in whom there would be no guile. Thus reformed and purified, they would be fed and protected by the good Shepherd; and, being safe under his care, they would not be afraid of any enemies. The pure and happy state of the Church in the latter days seems intended in the thirteenth verse.

V. 14—17. These verses without doubt principally relate to the future conversion of the Jews, and the glorious times that shall follow. Then the Church will express her exuberant joy with loud acclamations and thanksgivings. For the Lord will remove the judgments, temporal and spiritual, with which the Jewish nation hath very long been visited, and those persecutions and oppressions, with which antichristian powers have afflicted the Church; and he will cast out every enemy that opposes her. Then will he evidently appear as the King of Israel in the midst of her, (Marg. Ref.) and she shall see no more those evils of which she had hitherto complained. This cannot have had its accomplishment, either in respect of the Jews or of the Christian Church. But in the day here predicted the Church will be encouraged, by the Lord and his ministers, against all her fears, and animated to every duty. For the Lord her God, her Friend and Portion, will dwell in the midst of her, with mighty power to defend her and destroy her enemies: he will assuredly save her from all her oppressors and corrupters, and rejoice over her with great complacency and delight; he will rest in his love, as well pleased in her, constant in his affection, and taking pleasure in expressing it: nay, he will rejoice over her, as men rejoice over the objects of their endeared love with songs denoting their delight and satisfaction. These multiplied and energetic expressions are intended to show the abundant light, purity, peace, comfort, and prosperity of the Church, in those happy times, when believers will almost live the life of heaven upon earth.

V. 18—20. In the intervening ages, previous to the glorious times predicted, believers would often be sorrowful, because they wanted liberty or opportunity of meeting together in the most solemn public ordinances, (as the pious Jews had been during the Babylonish captivity:) whilst their enemies would reproach their assemblies, as scenes of sedition or iniquity; or scoff at and deride believers because they were unable to meet in them: and this would greatly add to their burden. But the Lord would at length gather them together, and afford them abundance of these opportunities, and much comfort in them: he would ruin all their oppressors, and save every feeble believer, that was scarcely able to walk in those rugged ways, or was driven away by the force of temptation or persecution: and he would cause true Christians to be greatly honoured and commended in all those countries, where they had been stigmatized and treated with contempt. Especially the converted Jews shall be thus honoured among all people of the earth, when they shall be gathered from their dispersed and captive state, into the Church of Christ, and into their own land, in the open view of all nations. These events alone can fully answer to the language of this prophecy.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—7.

What a lamentable proof is it of the strength of human depravity, that Jerusalem should ever become an infamous, polluted, and oppressive city! But when this is the case with any part of the visible Church, doubtless an awful wo will soon be denounced against it: for before such an event can take place, men must generally have been long habituated to disobey the voice of the Lord, to neglect his corrections and instructions, to withdraw their confidence from him, and to forsake, or hypocritically to attend on his ordinances. It must also commonly arise from the misconduct of rulers and teachers: for when they become oppressive and iniquitous, or light and treacherous; when they pollute the sanctuary and pervert the law; they soon cause the people either to run into open impiety, from abhorrence of their crimes; or into error and false religion, in imitation of their examples, or by imbibing their doctrines. Yet it has too often been the case, that Zion's professed healers have proved her worst disease; and her princes, priests, and prophets, the most abandoned to impiety and vice: and neither the presence of the just Lord in his ordinances; nor his example, his word, his messages by his more faithful servants, or even his providential corrections, could put them to shame. In this case, warnings and deliverances only tend to increase men's condemnation: for whilst the Lord desolates cities and nations for their sins, he requires his professing people to fear him and receive instruction, that they may escape ruin; and yet they often grow more corrupt under warnings and corrections, and are more assiduous in doing evil than the most diligent believer is in doing good.

V. 8—20.

The remnant of godly persons, that live in evil times, may confidently wait upon the Lord, both to save them, and to terminate the success of his enemies. He will certainly arise to pour upon the wicked the fierceness of his anger, and the whole earth will be devoured by the fire of his jealousy; yet then will he peculiarly bless those that wait for him. When he casts off professed Christians for their hypocrisy, he will send his Gospel to those who have hitherto sat in darkness: and his grace will render his people sincere in their professions, and holy in their conversation; teaching them a pure language, honourable to God, and edifying to men. Such persons should all call upon and serve the Lord with one consent; as "he seeketh "those to worship him, who worship him in spirit and "truth." For this purpose his Gospel is sent into regions, divided from each other by mountains, rivers, and seas; and all, who become humble suppliants to him for salvation, through faith in Jesus Christ, are numbered amongst the genuine children of his Church, and form a holy priesthood, to offer spiritual sacrifices unto him, wherever they are dispersed. They are also all made partakers of true repentance and complete forgiveness, and none of them shall be put to shame, because of their former transgressions. But the Lord will certainly cast out of his Church all that rejoice in their pride, and are haughty, because of those privileges which they abuse and idolize. He will exclude boasting, and leave no man any thing to glory in, save the Lord Jesus, "as made of God to him, "wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption." All whom he saves are made poor in spirit, and most of them are poor and afflicted in the world: but whilst they trust in him, they cannot but be rich, noble, wise, and happy. Their humiliation in themselves, and their obligations to the Redeemer, concur in forming them upright and sincere; a people that do no iniquity, speak no lies, neither is a deceitful tongue found in their mouths: though nothing is more common amongst many who profess, disgrace, and are proud of, the doctrines of the Gospel; as their shops, customers, and those who depend on their word, too often can testify! But the sheep of Christ are harmless and inoffensive: they may securely rest upon his word, and repose their souls under his care; and he will feed them in his plenteous pastures, and preserve them from the power and terror of every enemy. Many indeed are the troubles of the righteous, from within and without; yet may they still rejoice in God, and triumph in his love. The king of Israel in the midst of them is the Lord of hosts; and he will soon take away their judgments, and save them so effectually, that they shall see evil no more for ever. Let us then encourage each other and ourselves against dejection, that our hands may not be slack, when we should work, or resist our enemies. The love of our mighty Redeemer is as large as his power: he rejoices to save the returning prodigal, to comfort the weeping penitent, to relieve the trembling suppliant, or to restore the wandering sheep: he delights in the objects of his choice, the purchace of his blood, the trophies of his victories, the work of his new creating grace. He rests well pleased in his love of his redeemed Church, and exults with joy over every poor sinner, whom he hath taught to trust in his mercy, to love his name, to obey his commands, and to copy his example. Surely then our hearts should rejoice in him, when we hear such words of infinite condescension and grace! We should express our joy by singing and speaking his praises; and we should rest in his love, and seek no other Refuge, Portion, or Felicity. We may now indeed be sorrowful, because detained from his solemn ordinances, whether by sickness, persecution, or providential hinderances: but we should be glad that this is our cross and grief; and we may rejoice at being reproached for loving the house and word of our God. In due time we shall be gathered into the temple above, from all our dispersions, notwithstanding our weakness and haltings in the Lord's ways: and then he will turn our mourning into joy and our reproach into honour, before the whole world. At length the last enemy shall be destroyed, and our captivity to Satan, sin, and death shall be finally abolished; and our glory and felicity will be perfect, unchangeable, and eternal.

BOOK OF HAGGAI.

The prophets, whose writings have hitherto engaged our attention, lived before, or during, the Babylonish captivity, and referred to it in most of their predictions; but the three that follow, prophesied after the return of the Jews to their own land. Haggai delivered all the messages here recorded, within four months. They relate to the building of the second temple, and contain reproofs, exhortations, and encouragements respecting that undertaking; and also predictions of Christ and his kingdom connected with them, nay, of the final and universal prevalence of the Gospel. The apostle Paul quotes Haggai, to prove that the prophets foretold one great revolution in the external state of the Church, which would shortly take place, and only one. (Comp. ii. 6, 7. with Heb. xii. 26, 27.)

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. (Notes, Ezra iv. 17—24. v. 1, 2. vi. 6—15.) The second year of Darius Hystaspis was about sixteen years after Cyrus issued his decree. The repeated testimony of Zechariah shews that these events occurred, not more than seventy years after the destruction of the temple by Nebuchadnezzar: (Zech. i. 12, 13. vii. 3—5.) and as no Darius reigned in Persia till long after that term, except Darius Hystaspis, it is beyond all doubt that he was intended. Shealtiel is exactly the same, in the original, with Salathiel, 1 Chr. iii. 17: and Josedech, with Jehozadak, 1 Chr. vi. 14, 15. It would have been more convenient to the mere English reader, if the same persons had uniformly been called by the same names, where the original is the same, or so nearly the same, as to preclude all doubt of the meaning. Jeshua, (Ezra ii. 2,) is spelt differently from Joshua in this verse: but the same person is evidently intended. 'If these two notable 'men had need to be stirred up and admonished of their 'duties; what shall we think of other governors, whose 'doings are either against God, or very cold in his cause?'

V. 2. The Jews, discouraged by opposition, had left off to build the temple; and they concluded that it was not a proper time to resume that work, though they did not intend to give it up. They were then few in number, and poor, compared with the affluence of Israel in the days of Solomon; their enemies were many, and the kings of Persia frowned on them; they had many temporal concerns, personal and public, to attend on; and they concluded that they should not be able to build the temple at all, or not with suitable magnificence. They therefore thought it best to rest contented with an altar on which to sacrifice, till a more favourable opportunity arrived. But the Lord of hosts, (whose power was sufficient to support them against all opposition,) took notice of these vain excuses, and therefore sent the prophet with the subsequent message. 'They preferred policy and private profit to 'religion.'

3 Then came the word of the LORD by Haggai the prophet, saying,

4 Is it time for you, O ye, [g] to dwell in your ceiled houses, [h] and this house lie waste?

5 Now therefore [i] thus saith the LORD of hosts; [*] Consider your ways.

6 Ye [k] have sown much, and bring in little; [l] ye eat, but ye have not enough; ye drink, but ye are not filled with drink; ye clothe you, but there is none warm; and he that earneth wages, earneth wages to put it into a bag † with holes.

7 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, [m] Consider your ways.

8 Go up [n] to the mountain, and bring wood, [o] and build the house; [p] and I will take pleasure in it, [q] and I will be glorified, saith the LORD.

9 Ye [r] looked for much, and, lo, it came to little; and when ye brought it home, I did ‡ blow upon it. [s] Why? saith the LORD of hosts. [t] Because of mine house that is waste, and ye run every man unto his own house.

10 Therefore [u] the heaven over you is stayed from dew, and the earth is stayed from her fruit.

11 And [x] I called for a drought upon the land, and upon the mountains, and upon the corn, and upon the new wine, and upon the oil, and upon that which the ground bringeth forth, and upon men, and upon cattle, and upon all the labour of the hands.

12 ¶ Then [y] Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, and Joshua the son of Josedech, the high-priest, with all the remnant of the people, obeyed the voice of the LORD their God, and the words of Haggai the prophet, as the LORD their God had sent him, and the people did [z] fear before the LORD.

V. 4. Though the Jews thought themselves unable to rebuild the temple; yet they were very active about their own houses, and many of them decorated them with wainscot and ceilings of cedar, or other valuable materials; and then lived in them at ease and in indulgence. But if the times had been so bad, as to render it impracticable for them to build the temple, it would not have been in their power to acquire such houses for themselves. Their excuses were therefore fallacious, and even Zerubbabel and Joshua were faulty in conniving at their negligence. (Note, Ezra iv. 17—24.) The decree of Artaxerxes or Smerdis the usurper, against the building of the temple, lost all its authority when he was slain; but that of Cyrus remained in full force: had the Jews therefore been duly zealous and courageous, they would immediately have resumed the work, which had been violently interrupted.—'It argues a great contempt of God and religion, when 'men think no cost or finery too much to bestow upon 'themselves; and the meanest accommodation good enough 'for the service of God.' (Lowth.)

V. 5—11. 'Consider the plagues of God upon you 'for preferring your policy to his religion; and because ye 'seek not him first of all.' The Lord next called the people to "consider their ways:" that is, not only their conduct and motives by way of self examination, but also the state of their affairs; by which they would perceive that their conduct was as impolitic as it was irreligious. They well knew that their crops of corn had been very scanty, in proportion to the land tilled, or the seed sown. They had not a sufficiency of meat or drink, either through scarcity, or for want of a blessing; their clothes soon wore out, and did not defend them from the cold; and the hard earned wages of the labourer or mechanic, seemed to be put into a bag with holes, they were so soon gone, through dearness of provisions and a variety of expenses. It was therefore expedient for them to review their conduct: and this would show them, that they should immediately, (though to the neglect of their own concerns,) go to mount Lebanon and prepare timber, and set about the building of the temple: and God would graciously take pleasure in it, as the centre of his worship, and the type of Christ, though far inferior in magnificence to Solomon's temple; yea, he would deem himself glorified by it. They must know, that when they had used all proper means, had every probability, and had entertained the most sanguine expectations of a large increase, they were strangely disappointed: and even what they had brought home was unaccountably wasted, as if the Lord had blown upon it, and driven it away! And wherefore was this? Truly, because they neglected the temple and left it in ruins, whilst they eagerly employed themselves in building and decorating their own houses: and therefore they were visited by drought and famine, and various diseases, both of man and beast. (Marg. Ref.)

Brought it home, &c. (9) 'The line may very well 'be translated: "And ye have brought an offering to my "house, and I have snuffed at it." (Bp. Newcombe.) (ii. 15.)

V. 12. This message of the prophet had the proper effect. Though the rulers and people were faulty, yet they were not hardened as their fathers had been: and though they had not lately been accustomed to the ministry of prophets, and Haggai seems not to have wrought any miracle: yet they considered him as sent by the LORD their God, and reverenced his authority. Zerubbabel and Joshua were most ready to receive this reproof, and attend to his exhortation, and the people were influenced by their example. They therefore feared the Lord and obeyed his

CHAP. II.

The prophet encourages the Jews, by assuring them that this temple, though far inferior to the former in magnificence, would be rendered more glorious by the presence of the Messiah, 1—9. By the law concerning things holy and unclean, he shows that their sins had deprived them of God's blessings, which from that time he would vouchsafe them, 10—19. He predicts the prosperity of Chirst's kingdom, under that of Zerubbabel his ancestor and type, 20—23 voice, and immediately began to make preparation for the work.

V. 13—15. Within little more than three weeks after the first message was delivered, the people having already testified their readiness to obey, the prophet was sent again to them with a gracious assurance of the Lord's presence and favour. He was called the Lord's messenger, (the word being the same that is generally rendered an angel,) because of his employment, which was to bring messages from God to the people. His word was attended with a powerful blessing, in stirring up their minds and animating their courage for this arduous undertaking. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Even pious persons often need to be excited by repeated admonitions to the duties of their station; especially when attended by danger and difficulty. Many good works have been purposed, and not performed, because men imagined that the proper time was not come: thus believers lose opportunities of usefulness, and sinners procrastinate in the concerns of their souls till it be too late. The Lord notices all the objections and excuses, with which men satisfy themselves and each other in the neglect of duty; and when he shall expose and answer them, every mouth will be stopped. Providential dispensations are seldom interpreted properly without a careful attention to the word of God: thus many conclude that poverty or trouble excuses them from duty; when indeed it is intended to rebuke their negligence. They who plead that they cannot at present afford to contribute to pious or charitable designs, often lavish in needless expenses on their tables, houses, furniture, apparel, or decorations, ten times as much as was expected from them for far better purposes: and few are aware how large a fund frugality and self-denial may raise, even from persons of moderate incomes, for good works, without the least injury to them or their families. But if men will dwell in ceiled houses, and indulge every wayward inclination, when the house of God lies waste and his poor are starved, they may expect rebukes and corrections. How can they, who evidently do not seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, think themselves true Christians? And are not lukewarm professors marked in God's word with peculiar disapprobation? (Rev. iii. 15, 16.) Indeed they who do not prosper in the world ought to consider their ways: for "there is, that withholdeth more than is meet, and it tendeth to poverty." If the Lord be offended by a man's selfishness, he can easily blast all his projects, and insensibly reduce him, whatever his occupation or industry may be. He can deprive him of all comfort in his possessions; and even if his income be not scanty, he can cause it to spend badly, and then all his gains shall seem to be put into a bag with holes; all his labours be fruitless, all his possessions blown upon, and all his expectations frustrated. Our dependence is in every thing so entirely on God, that when we look for much, and have little, and are remarkably crossed in our undertakings, it behooves us to inquire, wherefore he contendeth with us? And if we attend to his word, consult his ministers, inquire of him in prayer, and examine ourselves; we shall not fail to find out the cause. Perhaps some duty is neglected, the payment of some vow is postponed, or some worldly object is idolized. When this discovery is made, we should without delay amend what was amiss: and if we attend to those things, which please the Lord and wherein he is glorified, whatever else be neglected or procrastinated, we shall best consult our own true interest and comfort: but without that faith and fear, which produce unreserved and prompt obedience, we cannot expect that the Lord will be with us. The most exalted or sacred characters ought not to be offended, when reminded of their duty by the meanest servant of God; they should reverence his authority, and submit to his reproof, in the words of his ministers: and the more wisdom and piety they have, the more readily will they attend to such exhortations. When leading men set the example, it will influence the remnant of the people, and they may expect encouragement: and if the Lord be with us, who can be against us, to prevent our success, or in any measure to hurt us? These considerations should stir up our spirits to be diligent and courageous in laying ourselves out in the work assigned us: yet if any means prove successful to render us zealous in good works, we must give all the praise to him, from whom alone "cometh every good "and perfect gift," and "who worketh in us to will and to "do of his good pleasure."

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 3—5. (Note, Ezra iii. 12, 13.) This took place about sixty-eight years from the time, when the temple had been destroyed, and about seventeen years from the issuing of the decree of Cyrus: and some Jews remained yet alive, who had seen the former temple in their youth, before they were carried to Babylon. These could not but observe, from the preparations, the plan, and the foundations, that this new temple was likely to be much inferior to it in grandeur. Whilst they lamented this, they seem to have undervalued the labours of the people, and to have discouraged their work; and therefore the Lord sent his servant to prevent the effects. He allowed, that this house must appear as nothing in the eyes of those who had seen the other in its glory; yet, that should not prevent the rulers and people from proceeding with vigour and courage; as God was with them to prosper their work, according to the promises of the covenant made with their fathers; and his spirit, the Author of all true glory and excellency, remained with them, to direct, sanctify, and bless them, as in the days of old; and therefore they needed not fear acceptance or assistance. Some interpret the LORD of hosts, the Word that covenanted with them, and the Spirit, of the three Persons in the Trinity, who would remain with them as the peculiar people of the triune JEHOVAH.

V. 6—9. For their further encouragement, the people were informed, that during the continuance of this temple, a new dispensation would be introduced. "Yet once "more," the Lord intended entirely to change the external form of his Church, and to bring in that dispensation that would endure to the end. 'The word, once, 'has a clear sense, if understood of the evangelical age; 'for many political revolutions succeeded; but only one 'great and final religious revolution.' (Bp. Newcombe.) It should also be remembered, that the apostle has thus interpreted it. (Heb. xii. 25, 26.) This would be in a little while, compared with the years that had passed since the first promise of the Messiah, or even from the giving of the law. Then the Lord would shake the heavens and the earth, &c.: various convulsions and changes would take place in the Jewish Church and state, which would end in the abrogation of the ritual law and the whole Mosaic dispensation, the disannulling of the national covenant, the subversion of their constitution, the destruction of Jerusalem, and the ruin of their civil government: and attended with earthquakes, tempests, and violent commotions of the elements, above and beneath, by sea and by land. (Marg. Ref.) These events would be preceded by great revolutions and commotions among the nations; the Persian monarchy would be subverted by the Macedonians, and that by the Romans; and all these changes would make way for the coming of Christ, and the introduction of his spiritual kingdom. At the appointed time, He, "the Desire of all nations," whom all nations ought to desire, and in due time would desire; He, in whom all the nations of the earth were to be blessed, and of whose coming a general expectation would prevail, as of some most desirable event; He would come, and his presence, who is the glory of the Lord and the true Temple, "in whom all the fulness of the Godhead dwells bodily," would fill that house with glory, and render it far more glorious, than the Shechinah (or visible glory) rendered Solomon's temple. The Lord could, if he so pleased, enrich that house with silver and gold beyond the former temple; for all the treasures of the earth are his: but as a more spiritual dispensation was about to be introduced, he had a greater and a more spiritual glory to confer upon it, in the presence of Immanuel, his incarnate Son. Thither he would come, as the Prince of peace; there he would preach and confer peace; and in the mean time God would give peace to those who worshipped there, in anticipation of the blessings of Messiah's reign. The second temple could not excel the first in glory, in any other respect than this: it was indeed considerably beautified, decorated, and enriched in after ages, but nothing equal to the splendour of the temple in the days of Solomon: and the Jews allow, that the ark of the covenant, the visible glory, and some other things which distinguished the former temple, were wanting in this. But they cannot find any thing that is worthy to be mentioned, in which it was more glorious; though they have been excited to rack their invention to the utmost for that purpose. For as the second temple hath been destroyed above seventeen hundred years; if nothing else can be adduced, in which its glory exceeded that of Solomon's temple, it must be allowed that the presence of the promised Messiah was intended; and if this be yielded, it will undeniably follow that Jesus of Nazareth was he: and thus they must condemn their own obstinate rejection of him, concerning whom all their own prophets spoke. For in this alone did the glory of the latter house exceed that of the former, that the Desire of all nations, the Lord of glory, came to it personally, and in human nature. So that this prophecy alone is sufficient to decide the controversy with them, seeing they allow the divine inspiration of Haggai. Some indeed speak, as if Herod the Great entirely pulled down this temple and builded another: but the account of Josephus on that subject is not consistent with itself and with other writers, and seems rather penned in the style of panegyric than of history: and, however Herod repaired, beautified, and enlarged the out-buildings of the temple, it never was the general opinion of the Jews themselves, that he demolished the second temple; but that it continued the same, till its destruction by the Romans. With that event the old dispensation ended; for the Desire of all nations was come, and he erected his spiritual temple, as it were, upon the ruins of it. The word rendered come, (7) is plural, and it is with probability supposed, that the substantive should be plural also. "The desires of "all the nations shall come." Some learned men, therefore, have argued, that the precious or desirable things, namely, the riches of the nations, are meant; and that it is a forced construction to interpret the passage of the Messiah. The objections to this interpretation are, the 'great solemnity of the introduction, (6, 7:) and the 'impropriety of the language, "The desirable things of "all nations shall come," 'when it should rather be said, "the desirable things of all nations shall be brought." 'The word is used plurally, with the force of the singular, '(like delicia, or spes, in Latin,) Dan. ix. 23, vir "desideriorum, "greatly beloved." 'Cant. v. 16, we 'have—and ipse totus desideria for desiderabilis.' (There is a plural Hebrew noun of the same root as that here made use of, applied by the Spouse to her Beloved, or by the Church to Christ. It is rendered, "altogether love-"ly," but is more literally, altogether lovelinesses. 'It may 'well be doubted, whether the second temple could exceed 'that of Solomon, in the splendour and costliness of its 'ornaments. Prideaux values the gold, with which the 'holy of holies alone was overlaid, at four millions three 'hundred and twenty thousand pounds sterling.' 'It 'seems to me that, supposing the Messiah to be pro-'phesied of, greater precision in the language would not 'have been used: for this would have led the Jews to 'expect a demolition of the temple then building, and the 'erection of another in its stead. No nominal distinction, 'between Zerubbabel's and Herod's temple, seems to have 'been ever made by the Jews: but in popular language, 'these structures, though really different, were spoken of 'as the same. On one occasion, Josephus himself men-'tions only two buildings of the temple; a former, in the 'time of Solomon; and a latter, in that of Cyrus. In 'Chronicon Hebræum, &c. Vespasian is said to have de-'stroyed the temple four hundred and forty years after it 'was rebuilt.' (Bp. Newcombe.) No more than seven years were spent in building Solomon's temple, and only four in building the second temple, from the time when the Jews resumed the work: it is therefore most evident, that Herod never pulled down the temple, in order to erect a new one. There was a temple for the worship of JEHOVAH according to the law, during all the forty-six years which were spent in repairing or rebuilding it.—One part must therefore have been taken down at once, as far as needful for the purpose, and no more: but the old foundation and many parts of the structure no doubt remained. Whoever compares the sixth chapter of the first of Kings, even with the most splendid accounts of the second temple, however adorned with costly stones, &c. must perceive, that the former being overlaid in every part with pure gold, gave it a glory, of this kind, which was incomparably beyond that of the second temple, in its highest magnificence: and the prophecy clearly means, that the glory of the second temple should exceed the glory which the first had at any time been favoured with. Nothing but the presence of the incarnate Son of God could fulfil this prediction.

V. 10—14. The time that had elapsed from Haggai's first message to this, being nearly four months, seems to have been taken up in preparing to build: but now the people proceeded to the work itself. The prophet was on this occasion ordered to propose two questions to the priests, the ordinary interpreters of the law. Supposing a man should carry in the skirt of his garment any part of the holy oblations, (which were to be eaten by the priests alone, in the courts of the temple,) and then with that same skirt touch some ordinary provision, would that communicate sanctity to the bread, flesh, wine, or oil thus touched? This the priests answered in the negative; ceremonial holiness could not be thus conveyed. On the other hand, if a man who was unclean by a dead body, touched such provisions, would that not render them unclean, unfit to be offered to God, or even for common use? To which they answered in the affirmative. It was then evident, that uncleanness was more easily communicated than holiness: and the inference was, that the people, when they lived in the neglect of their duty as to the building of the temple, through a covetous or self-indulgent attention to secular concerns, could not have their ordinary employments sanctified by the sacrifices which they offered; but on the contrary, they polluted their religious duties by their own unbelief and hypocrisy. "That thing, which is of itself 'good, cannot make another so; and therefore they ought 'not to justify themselves by their sacrifices and cere-'monies: but he that is unclean and not pure of heart, 'doth corrupt those things, and make them detestable to 'God, which else are good and godly.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15—19. The people were therefore called on, to consider from that time, both what had befallen them and what was about to befal them: and to compare these together. Before they had begun to place more courses of stone, on the foundation which they had laid some years before, that is, during the years that the work had been neglected, they had been strangely frustrated in their expectations. If a man came to a heap of corn in the straw or in the chaff, which he computed at twenty measures, he seldom obtained more than ten: for there proved to be much straw and chaff, and little corn. Or if a man expected fifty barrels of wine from the grapes which he carried to the wine-press, when he came to draw it off after they had been pressed, there proved no more than twenty, they were so unproductive. For the Lord had been so offended with their carnal negligence of his temple, that he disappointed them in all their works; and visited them with various calamities, which they ascribed to second causes, and so did not repent or return to his service. (Marg. Ref.) But let them take notice that from that very day, when they began to build on the foundation of his house; though their corn was not gathered in, nor had their trees begun to bud, (for it was nearly the depth of winter,) and there was no appearance of a favourable change: yet from that day he would as remarkably bless them with fruitful seasons and an abundant increase; both graciously to recompense their obedience, and to encourage them to proceed.

V. 20—23. "And the word of the LORD came the "second time unto Haggai, in," &c. The conclusion of the book was a second message sent by the prophet, on the same day with that which precedes. Zerubbabel, as the governor of Judah, was the type as well as the progenitor, of Christ; to whom doubtless the prophecy was principally directed. The Lord again declared his purpose of causing violent concussions and revolutions in the heavens and earth, or in the state of the Church and of the world. He would subvert monarchies one after another, and destroy nations by intestine wars. But he would take Zerubbabel, and keep him safe as his signet; and employ him to rule over his people, as a man ratifies deeds by his signet or seal, and sets it on any thing as a security, or to mark authenticity or appropriation: for he had chosen him for that purpose. This was a gracious intimation, that the Lord would preserve Zerubbabel, and the people of Judah by him, amidst the machinations of their enemies and the ruin of surrounding states and kingdoms; but it also predicted the establishment and continuance of the kingdom of Christ, the elect Servant of the Father, the Governor of Judah; by union with whom his people are sealed with the Holy Ghost, and stamped with his image, and thus distinguished from all other persons, and preserved unto the day of redemption. And it predicted the changes, that would take place in the Church, and in the kingdoms of the world even to that time, when the kingdom of Christ shall subvert, and occupy the place of all those monarchies that have opposed his cause. 'This could not be fulfilled in Zerubbabel, who did not 'in all likelihood live many years after the finishing of 'the temple; and to be sure did not see any of these 'great changes here foretold: and therefore the Messiah 'must be here described under the name of Zerubbabel, 'as he elsewhere is under that of David. (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The word of God is intended to encourage us, as well as to excite us to our work. They who have witnessed, or read of extraordinary effects produced by the power of God in his ordinances, should not despise or dishearten those who are endeavouring to do good in a little way with small success, and under great disadvantages. Though it may appear as nothing in their eyes, yet the seed may spring up and become a great tree; and every degree of good to souls should be thought important. Indeed men are very incompetent judges of what is glorious in religious matters: many things excite admiration because they are noisy and ostentatious; whereas "the kingdom of God cometh not with outward "observation." Abiding and blessed effects are sometimes produced by obscure and despised instruments, and for a time in silence and neglect: till at length they burst forth to public view, and claim attention as excellent, useful, and permanent; when such, as for a little time excited admiration and applause, but were more superficial, vanish or terminate in confusion. If we be therefore occupied according to the command of God, and in dependence on his promise, we should be strong in faith, vigorous and active, labouring in hope, even in obscurity and with little visible success; for though man may despise us, the LORD of Hosts will be with us, according to his covenanted word, ("Lo, I am with "you always, even to the end of the world:") and his Spirit, who abideth with his people for ever, will not refuse us a measure of success and comfort in our work: therefore we should not fear. That power, which shakes the heavens and the earth, the sea and the dry land; and which effected such changes and revolutions among the Jews and Gentiles, in the first ages of the Gospel, can easily prepare men's hearts in any congregation, or of any description, to welcome Christ as the Desire of their hearts and precious to their souls. He whose are all the riches of the earth and all their possessors, can defray the expense of any undertaking which is really for his glory; so that we may depend on him for whatever we want: and if his ministers be poor, or the places appropriated to his worship mean, or any apparently good design fail of adequate resources, we may be sure that he sees it best for his servants, and most for his own glory, that it should be so. They, however, who are stewards of his gold and silver, should remember, that he will demand an account of the use which they make of them; and when they contribute most liberally to pious or charitable designs, they should observe, that they only render to the Lord a portion of his own, and that he hath a right to demand the whole whenever he pleases. But the glory of the Gospel-Church is greater than that of either the former or the latter temple: for "Behold a greater than Solomon is here!" The Desire of all nations is the precious Foundation and approved Corner-stone of this spiritual temple: believers are the living stones of which it is formed; and it is the constant habitation of God by his Holy Spirit, and shall be for evermore. Here are contained the whole spiritual beauty and glory of the earth: hereafter, being removed to heaven, these will be the joy and admiration of angels and arch-angels to all eternity. May then revolutions and reformations in churches and kingdoms, make way for Christ to be desired and valued by all nations; may he abundantly fill his habitation with the glory of his holiness, peace, and consolation; and may the poor blinded Jews have their eyes opened to behold the preciousness of him, whom they have hitherto rejected, and who indeed was "a Light to lighten the Gentiles, and the Glory of his "people Israel!"

V. 10—23.

Holiness becometh the temple of God and his spiritual priesthood; and they who are appointed to interpret his word, ought to be ready and expert in solving cases respecting it. The merest novice, however, in spiritual things, must know that "evil communications corrupt "good manners;" and yet the company of saints hath no natural efficacy to sanctify: for diseases are often infectious, but health cannot be imparted in the same way. Pollution, being congenial to our nature, is more easily communicated than holiness: how dangerous then is it for those who profess godliness to form intimate connexions with unbelievers, vainly hoping to impart good, when they have immensely more cause to fear the most important injury to themselves! We should also learn not to depend on external services, which are all rendered unclean by an unbelieving, carnal, and hypocritical heart. Whilst we live in known sin or neglect of known duty, we cannot reasonably expect benefit from ordinances, or comfortable success in our temporal concerns; but when we are uprightly obedient, the Lord graciously accepts our imperfect and defiled services. Were we carefully to consider the different parts of our lives, and compare them with each other, we should many of us perceive an evident difference between those in which we have been totally irreligious or greatly negligent, and those in which we have endeavoured "first to seek the kingdom of God and his right-"eousness;" and that the former have been far more full of anxiety and disappointment, the latter of success and comfort, even in outward things. But if it have not been remarkably so with us; yet the Lord will curse the blessings of the wicked, and embitter the prosperity of the negligent; and he will sweeten the cup of affliction to those who humbly and diligently serve him. And whatever changes take place on earth, all will concur in promoting the comfort, honour, and happiness of his servants, who devote themselves unreservedly to him: even as they will tend to establish the kingdom of Christ, the chosen Signet of the Father, by whom all believers are preserved and sealed unto life eternal.

BOOK OF ZECHARIAH.

Zechariah began to prophesy two months after Haggai; being raised up to be his coadjutor in exciting the Jews to rebuild the temple: but it is probable, that he continued to exercise his prophetical office during a much longer time; though the visions and predictions, in the latter part of the book, are not dated. Various traditions are extant concerning him: but in general they are improbable, or uncertain and frivolous; so that no more is known of him, than what is recorded in Scripture, and may be seen by consulting the marginal references on the verses in which his name is mentioned. His prophetical character and usefulness are recorded by Ezra: (Ezra v 1, 2. vi. 14:) and his book is repeatedly quoted and referred to, and thus sanctioned as the word of God, in the New Testament. (Com. ix 9. with Matt. xxi. 4, 5. John xii. 14—16.—xi. 12, 13. with Matt. xxvii. 7—10.—xii. 10. with John xix. 34—37. Rev. i. 7.—xiii. 7. with Matt. xxvi. 31. Mark xiv. 27.) The numerous and extraordinary prophecies, however, which it contains, sufficiently demonstrate that the prophet "spake as he was moved by the Holy Ghost." Many of these have been undeniably and most wonderfully accomplished: and the rest, though considered as peculiarly obscure, on careful investigation will be found to foretel, sometimes under other emblems and metaphors, the same future events with the most remarkable predictions, both in the Old and New Testament.

Zechariah has been styled, 'the sun among the minor prophets;' and the time approaches, when the propriety of this title will no doubt be fully illustrated. After general warnings and exhortations to repentance, the prophet foretels the completion of the temple; the rebuilding, replenishing, security, and prosperity of Jerusalem and the cities of Judah, and the judgments of God on the enemies of his people: but, in doing this, under the types of Zerubbabel and Joshua, and by using figurative language, he predicts the coming of Christ our King and High Priest, the establishment of his kingdom, the building of his spiritual temple, the conversion of the Gentiles, and the enlargement and prosperity of the Christian Church, (i.—iv. vi.) By the visions of a flying roll and an ephah, he shows the judgments which would come on the wicked Jews, and the abject and oppressed state of the nation, after they had filled up the measure of their sins. (v.) Then follow prophecies (interspersed with warnings and exhortations) of prosperity and enlargement to Jerusalem; till at length, the strong nations of all languages would become the worshippers of JEHOVAH, and join themselves to his people. (vii. viii.) The intermediate events to the surrounding nations, and to the Jews from the completion of the temple till the coming of Christ, are next foretold, with figurative intimations of the prevalence of his Gospel, by the triumphs of his apostles and servants. (ix. x.) To these are subjoined, the destruction of the temple, and the rejection of the nation for contempt of Christ, and other sins; and afterwards of the nations that oppressed Jerusalem and the Church. At length a bright scene is opened to our view, by prophecies of the conversion of the nation to their crucified Messiah; the humility, zeal, and excellence of the new converts; and the final ruin of all idolatry and false religion. (xi. xii. xiii. 1—5.) And finally, the inspired writer returns to speak more explicitly of the death of Christ, as our sacrifice, by the sword of divine justice; the tremendous judgments which would then be inflicted on the unbelieving Jews; the preservation of a remnant, through fiery trials, and their conversion; the taking and destruction of Jerusalem to be followed by the ruin of the nations who had fought against her; the removing of hinderances, that the Gentiles might enter the Church; its establishment in the primitive times; the state of things during the succeeding ages, to the restoration of the Jews, and the rebuilding of their city, and the arrival of the Millennium, when all the nations will be either terribly destroyed, or become joyful worshippers of God; and the cause of holiness shall decidedly and finally prevail. (xiii. 7—9. xiv.) This is the general outline of the book, according to the author's view and interpretation of it, which is here given, to assist the reader in forming his judgment on the exposition of particular prophecies, in several of which the author has felt some uneasiness, in being compelled to differ from many learned and eminent commntators, who have gone before him.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. Barachiah. (Note, Matt. xxiii. 34—36.) It is the general opinion of expositors, that our Lord, in the passage referred to, means Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada. (Note, 2 Chr. xxiv. 19—24.) Yet some reasons may be alleged, which at least render it probable that the prophet Zechariah was intended. For why should the son of Jehoiada be called the son of Barachiah?—Chrysostom indeed asserts that Jehoiada was also called Barachiah, which signifies, one that blesses the LORD, as Jehoiada does one that confesses him: but there is not the smallest proof in Scripture that he was ever so called: and if the son of Jehoiada be meant, an alteration of the text in Matthew must be admitted, which is not advisable, unless absolutely unavoidable. Zechariah was a young man when he began to prophesy (ii. 4;) he might live long after the temple was finished, and after the death of Zerubbabel and Joshua. Zechariah, of Iddo, is mentioned among the priests, in the days of Joiakim, the son of Joshua, (Neh. xii. 16;) and tradition reports, that Zechariah was of the sacerdotal line. It is not peculiarly improbable, that the Jews, exasperated by his faithful expostulations, should murder him in the inner court of the temple: and the canon of Scriptures, being previously closed, could not record it, any more than the martyrdom of those who suffered under Antiochus Epiphanes. The silence of Josephus proves nothing, as he uniformly, when he can, passes over, or palliates, whatever he thinks dishonourable to his people. The transaction might, however, be well known in our Lord's time, by tradition, or authentic history. But, especially, let it be considered, how far it might have been previously expected, that the murder of one, who suffered before the persecuting reigns of Ahaz, Manasseh, and Jehoiakim, (during which more innocent blood was shed, and more prophets were slaughtered, than in all preceding ages,) should be mentioned as the last of the righteous persons, whose blood would be required of the generation which crucified the Messiah?—The blood shed, after the death of Zechariah, son of Jehoiada, especially filled up the measure of national wickedness, and brought on Judah the Babylonish captivity: yet, on this supposition, it is wholly passed over by our Lord. But if Zechariah the prophet were meant, and if he were murdered after the captivity, as the other Zechariah had been before; the whole appears natural, and probably he might be the last eminent person who thus suffered.

V. 2—4. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5, 6. "Your fathers are dead." 'It is true, you 'say, and so are the prophets too. It was not for them 'to live here for ever. But though my prophets died; 'yet the words, both of counsels and menaces, which 'they delivered to your fathers, live still. Your fathers 'freely confessed, to God's glory and to their own shame. 'Right, so as God threatened to deal with us according to 'our doings, even so hath he done; we are sinful and 'miserable, and he is just.' (Bp. Hall.) 'As men as-'tonished with my judgments,—not touched with true 'repentance.' It must be supposed, that some were merely astonished, and others truly penitent.

Overtake. 'As an enemy does one that he pursues.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 8—11. The prophet saw in a vision, by night, (as denoting perhaps the afflicted state of the Jews at that time;) a Man, one in human form, even the Son of God, who afterwards became Man for our salvation; and he sat like a warrior upon a red horse, as about to execute vengeance on the enemies of his people. He was stationed "in the bottom," or in a low valley (denoting both the humility and low estate of the Church;) "among myrtle-"trees," an apt emblem of true believers: and behind him were other horses with riders upon them. These seem to have been emblematic of the angels, as ministers of providence under Christ, who waited on him, being ready to execute his commands: and the diverse colours of their horses may denote the different dispensations of wrath or mercy, or both blended together, which they superintended. (Marg. Ref.) When the prophet saw these things, he inquired of One, who communed with him, what they meant? He is called "the Angel:" it is, however, evident, that he seems to have been the same, before and afterwards called "the Man;" for the Man, who stood among the myrtle-trees, informed the prophet, that these were they, whom JEHOVAH had commissioned to go throughout the earth and to examine the state of it. And immediately, the other angel, as having returned from executing this commission, showed this Angel, that all the earth was still and at rest. So that the person called the Man, (8. 10.) is also spoken of, as "the Angel of the "LORD." The Persian king reigned peaceably over his vast dominions. Even the Chaldeans at that time lived quietly under him, and other nations were remarkably at rest, whilst the Church was in great affliction and debasement. Having given this answer, they seem to have waited for another commission. 'The Man, or Angel, denotes 'the Logos, or Son of God, appearing as the Captain of 'God's hosts, or armies, (Josh. v. 13, 14.) They answer 'this Man, or Angel, as if he were their Superior or 'Commander.' (Lowth.) 'I had a vision by night; 'Christ, the Angel of the covenant, represented himself 'to me as a Man riding on a red horse;—and behind 'him were several angels, ready to attend his commands.' 'And the great Angel of the Covenant, (as taking the 'answer out of the mouth of that angel that spake to me;) 'answered and said, These are ministering spirits, whom 'the Lord hath sent to take a view of all the parts 'of the world.' (Bp. Hall.) (Marg. Ref.) The Per-'sian empire, and the other nations connected with Judea, 'enjoyed peace at that time: but the state of the Jews 'was unsettled,—which circumstance gives occasion to 'the following intercession.' (Bp. Newcombe.) 'All 'the enemies of the Persian empire in general, and 'of the Jews in particular, are quiet: so that this 'seems a proper time for setting forward the building 'of the temple, which has been so long interrupted.' Lowth.)

V. 12, 13. 'Christ, the Mediator, prayed for the 'salvation of his Church, which was now troubled, when 'all the countries about were at rest. 'Then Christ, the 'Mediator of his Church, answered and said,' &c. (Bp. Hall.) The person called a Man, and the Angel, was indeed the great Advocate and intercessor of the Church; and was introduced as pleading with the Father in behalf of Jerusalem and Judah, which had lain under his indignation for seventy years. This period, as it was dated from the first captivity in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, expired when Cyrus first issued his edict: but it was almost seventy years at this time from the final destruction of the city and temple: and just seventy years from the time when Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to Jerusalem. The Lord answered with good and comfortable words, such as were gracious and encouraging to the prophet; assuring the Angel that his intercession was accepted, and mercy would be shown to his people.

and [u] the LORD shall yet comfort Zion, and shalt yet [x] choose Jerusalem.

18 ¶ Then [y] lifted I up mine eyes, and saw, and behold [z] four horns.

20 And the LORD shewed me [c] four carpenters.

21 Then said I, What come these to do? And he spake, saying, [d] These are the horns which have scattered Judah, so that no man did lift up his head: but these are come to fray them, to cast out the horns of the gentiles, [e] which lifted up their horn over the land of Judah to scatter it.

V. 14—17. Upon this the Angel, who condescended to commune with the prophet, commissioned him to proclaim these good tidings to his people; and to assure them that the Lord of all the armies in heaven and earth was jealous with vehement jealousy, or zeal, for, as he had been against, Jerusalem. His love and endeared relation to his Church would not permit him to overlook the injuries done her. He was greatly displeased with the Chaldeans and others, who had reduced the Jews to deep and permanent distress: for he had been displeased a little with them, and they had helped forward the affliction. The Jews had indeed deserved the heaviest indignation of God; nor could their enemies proceed further than he intended: but they acted out of ambition, malice, and enmity against them; they took pleasure in their disgrace and misery; they used their power with cruelty and tyranny; and they intended to have continued them perpetually in a state of abject bondage and captivity. Therefore the Lord was highly displeased with them. 'God 'was displeased with the instruments of his vengeance, 'for their extreme cruelty to the Jews; and with the 'nations, who insulted over them in their distress.' (Bp. Newcombe.) (Marg. Ref.) At the same time, the Jews must be assured, that the Lord was actually reconciled to them, and was returned to dwell among them, with abundance of mercy: the temple would certainly be rebuilded; and the line stretched forth over every part of the city, to mark out the streets of it for building, that it might be restored to its ancient dimensions and prosperity. Nay, the prophet was further to proclaim, that, through the prosperity intended them, the other parts of the land would be replenished with cities: for the Lord would comfort the inhabitants of Zion, and make effectual his choice of Jerusalem, as the centre of his worship and the place of his peculiar and gracious residence.—These predictions primarily related to the state of the Jews after the captivity: yet that was but a shadow of what shall take place in the Church, after the termination of the oppression of the New Testament Babylon.

V. 18—21. The prophet had immediately after a vision of four horns, which represented those powers that had scattered the Jews and desolated the city and land. And then JEHOVAH, the person with whom he communed, showed him four carpenters, or smiths, (workmen,) who came to fray or demolish these horns of the Gentiles.—Some by the horns understand the four great monarchies, which had scattered or would scatter the Church: and then the carpenters or workmen may mean in part the same powers: the Persians cast out the Chaldeans, the Macedonians the Persians, and the Romans the Macedonians; and the Goths and other northern nations cast down the power of the Romans. Others understand, by the four horns, the several kings of Assyria, Chaldea, and Persia, that had successively crushed Israel and Judah: and then they suppose Zerubbabel, Joshua, Ezra, and Nehemiah, to be the four carpenters. But perhaps the vision only meant in general, that enemies from the four winds had arisen, or would arise, against the Jews and the Church; but that able instruments would be raised up to defeat their attempts, to deliver the people of God, and so make his cause to prevail and prosper. And this may take in both the ministers of his word and those of his Providence. Some interpret the four horns to mean the Samaritans, Ammonites, Arabians, and Philistines, who harassed the Jews that had returned from Babylon; but these nations have never scattered Israel and Judah. 'Why four? To 'denote that these kingdoms had many enemies; enemies 'on every side.' (Bp. Newcombe.) 'These signified all 'the enemies of the Church, east, west, north, and south. '(ii. 6.) The carpenters, or smiths, are God's instru-'ments, which with their mallets and hammers break 'these hard and strong horns; and declare that no ene-'mies' horn is so strong, but God hath an hammer to 'break it to pieces.' Smiths. 'These were to repair the 'destructions which the horns had made.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—6.

It tends greatly to the conviction of the hearers, when several of the Lord's ministers testify the same truths: and they, who profit by the means afforded them, shall have them continued and increased. Humiliation for sin must precede the comfort of forgiveness: and therefore "the "ministration of condemnation" should make way for "the ministration of righteousness and of the Spirit."—All our sufferings arise from the just displeasure of the Lord: and this must continue from generation to generation against our sinful race, except as any turn to him by repentance and faith. His readiness to forgive, and to return in mercy to the humble suppliant, should encourage and induce us to repent; and we should earnestly beg of him to "turn us, that we may be turned." We must follow no examples further than they accord to the word of God: and therefore they whose fathers have refused to hearken to the ministers of Christ, must by no means be like them: as the authority of parents will not bear men out in iniquity, idolatry, superstition, unbelief, or impenitence.

For where are they now? They are dead, their places know them no more, and their authority is terminated; but the word of God endureth for ever: they can do no more harm or good; but he ever liveth to save or to destroy. And where are they who died in their sins? If they have ruined their own souls, is that a reason why their posterity should ruin theirs also? How vain then is it for men to be satisfied with their notions or forms, merely because they received them by tradition from their fathers, when they are contrary to the word of God! They, and the prophets, apostles, or ministers, whose words they rejected, are gone to receive their recompense: but though the prophets do not live here for ever, yet their words of precept, promise, doctrine, or prediction, remain perpetually in force, and are taking effect, or receiving their accomplishment: and the Lord continues to deal with men according to their doings, as tried by this standard. Being dead, they yet speak, and warn us to keep out of the reach of their threatenings; for they will surely take hold of us, except we trust in the promises, and obey the commandments, of God; as they have already taken hold of numbers, who too late have found, and been forced to acknowledge, the truth of them.

V. 7—21.

Our divine Redeemer, our Brother and Friend, is not only King of kings, but likewise the Lord of all angels, who go throughout the earth, to execute his purposes of mercy or of judgment, for the good of his chosen people. He condescends to notice them in their lowest debasement; he delights in their humility; he takes pleasure in the effects of his own grace, which changes thorns into myrtles; he peculiarly approves of their patience and meekness in suffering afflictions: and he is ever ready to instruct, and to answer the humble inquiries of, his servants. But it is common for the enemies of God to be prosperous and careless, and quiet and at rest in their sins; whilst his people are enduring correction, disquieted by fears of wrath, or groaning under oppression or persecution. Yet their heavenly Advocate faileth not to plead their cause: and the measure and duration of their fiery, but purifying, trials, are determined by infinite wisdom and love. His fatherly indignation against them will not endure for ever; but he will have mercy on them, and comfort them at the appointed time. The Lord of hosts will never reject the pleadings of his beloved Son for his beloved people; but will answer him with gracious and comfortable words, which shall be made known to his afflicted brethren, as he sees needful for them. Whatever their deserts, fears, or sufferings may be, the Lord is jealous for them with a great jealousy; and his anger is little against them, compared with his heavy displeasure against their prosperous enemies; whose cruel contempt and enmity, when employed to correct the people of God, will ensure to themselves the heavier condemnation. But after every hiding of his face, the Lord will return to Zion with mercies; his spiritual temple will surely be builded, in defiance of all opposition, and his Churches must be spread abroad. Whatever opposers prevail to scatter his worshippers, or to run down his truth; he will raise up able instruments to defeat their designs, and to put them to confusion: whether persecuting tyrants are to be crushed by powerful kings and their armies; or proud infidels and heresiarchs to be confuted and silenced by his ministers, and the effectual preaching of his holy Gospel.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1—5. This was a continuation, or variation of the foregoing vision, and related to the same subjects. The prophet saw a man with a measuring line in his hand, whom he ventured to interrogate about his purpose: and he answered, that he was going to measure Jerusalem, and mark out the dimensions of it. If the Angel who talked with the prophet was the same as "the Man who stood among the myrtle-trees," (Notes, i. 8—13;) the Angel of the covenant, the Word and Son of God, as it seems most probable, (Marg. Ref.) the man with the measuring line must have been a created angel in human form. (Note, Ez. xl. 3.) When the Angel who talked with Zechariah went forth, the other angel, with the measuring line, went out to meet him, "To whom He," the first Angel, "said, Run," &c.—He directed him, with the measuring line, to give the prophet, who was then a young man, further satisfaction; and to assure him that Jerusalem would be vastly enlarged and replenished; that it would be inhabited, as cities which are not circumscribed by walls, but spread abroad on every side; or like those whose suburbs are far larger than the parts which lie within the walls. Yet would it be in perfect security; for the almighty Lord would defend it, as if it were walled round with fire, to consume every one that attempted to enter: and he would be the glory of his people, by dwelling in his temple in the midst of the city. The prosperity, security, and honour of Jerusalem, for some time after the captivity, were a feeble shadow of the extent of the Gospel-Church, the number of her converts, her security under the Lord's protection, and her glory, through his presence in his ordinances, and as dwelling in Jesus Christ. Yet this seems especially to refer to those glorious times that shall succeed the destruction of the New-Testament Babylon. 'Vitringa refers the literal 'completion of this prophecy to the time of the Macca-'bees; but thinks, that the protection and glory of the 'future Jerusalem may also be predicted.' (Rev. xx. 9.) (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 6—9. The language of this proclamation first claims our attention. The LORD of hosts is the Speaker, (8;) yet he speaks as one who is sent; at the same time he says, "I will shake my hand upon them;" "by this ye "shall know that the LORD of hosts sent me." (9.) The language shows, that not the prophet, but he that spake by him, was intended. There are evidently two persons here called "the LORD of Hosts:" one who is sent, and the other he who sent him: even the eternal Son of God, and the Father who sent him as his willing Messenger to be the Saviour of his people. Thus, relatively, as well as in respect of his human nature, he condescended to be inferior to the Father, though he claimed to be naturally equal, as One with him in the unity of the Godhead. And had not the prophet, or rather the Holy Spirit who spake by him, considered the promised Messiah as JEHOVAH Sabaoth, Immanuel, such language would not have been used; for it would have had an evident tendency to mislead us. 'This must necessarily be understood of 'Christ, who being God, equal with his Father, was sent, 'as he was Mediator, to dwell in his Church.' (11.) The Lord having promised to protect, honour, and bless Jerusalem, here issued a proclamation to the Jews, (who still remained in Babylon and the northern regions of Chaldea,) and the Israelites in their dispersions, to return without delay, that they might share her privileges. He had indeed scattered them on every side by their late calamities; and this was their chastisement and affliction, rather than their sin. But since the decree of Cyrus and the assurances of his returning favour, they would be inexcusable in remaining at a distance from the holy city, among devoted idolaters. They might till this time be considered as Zion, the Church of God, though dwelling in Babylon; but now they were commanded to deliver themselves, unless they preferred exile and slavery. For after the glory promised, and already begun to be conferred on Jerusalem, by his presence with his people, the LORD of hosts had sent his Messiah to the nations that had spoiled the Jews, to take vengeance upon them: as he who touched them, touched the apple of his eye; (speaking after the manner of men:) they touched him in the most tender part, and would surely excite his keenest resentment. (Ps. xvii. 8.) The Messiah would therefore shake his hand upon them, as making a signal to the executioners of his vengeance; and then they who had been their servants would plunder and oppress them; and by this the Jews would know that the Lord of hosts had sent him. They ought therefore without delay to flee from those devoted cities and countries, lest they should be involved in their calamities. Not long after this the Babylonians revolted from Darius, and he besieged that city for twenty months; and, having taken it, he made terrible slaughter of the inhabitants, and destroyed most of its fortifications, which prepared the way for its more complete desolation. This may also be considered as the call of Christ to his people, to separate from Antichristian corrupters and oppressors of his Church before that destruction of the New Testament-Babylon, which probably will be the grand means of convincing the Jews that Jesus was their promised Messiah. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10—13. This seems to be an express prediction of the coming of Christ in human nature, to dwell in the midst of his Church. The daughter of Zion, the inhabitants of Jerusalem, were called on to rejoice and sing, because he would come and dwell among them; for he was "the Glory of his people Israel." But he was also to be "a Light to the Gentiles;" and many nations, in that day, would renounce their idolatry, and join themselves to the Lord as his worshippers, among whom he would dwell; and by this the Jews would know that the LORD of hosts had sent him to them. Let the reader attentively mark the language; "many nations shall be "joined to JEHOVAH; and they shall be my people; and "I will dwell," &c. It is evident that JEHOVAH here speaks; yet he adds, "Thou shalt know that JEHOVAH "of hosts hath sent me unto thee." It is the singular number. The prophet should know, that JEHOVAH of hosts had sent that person to him, who spake in the name of the Lord; not the people, that JEHOVAH had sent the prophet to them. It seems impossible that this language should be mistaken, except it be disregarded. Few passages, even in the New Testament, more clearly speak of distinct persons in the unity of the Godhead, than this does. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Gen. xvi. 10, 11. 13, 14. xviii. 1, 2. 33. xxxii. 30. xlviii. 16. Ex. iii. 2. xxiii. 20—23.) —The day intended may either mean the time when the Gospel was first preached to the Gentiles; or that which will soon arrive, when the fulness of the gentiles shall come in. But the next verse evidently looks forward to the latter day: for then the Lord will inherit Judah, in his holy land, and again choose Jerusalem; having converted the Jews and brought them back to their own land. However, at both these times he would evidently be raised up out of his holy habitation, to plead the cause of his people against their enemies; and it would behoove all the fallen frail race of men to fear before him, and to adore these displays of his power, justice, truth, and love, with silence and submission, and without murmurs, objections, or opposition. —'Many were made proselytes to Judaism; the Edomites 'were converted in the time of John Hyrcanus.' (Bp. Newcombe.) The vanquished Edomites were indeed then compelled to be circumcised, and to profess themselves Jews. But can any man of reflection be satisfied with such an interpretation? Have not whole nations, and powerful nations, at least in as unexceptionable a way, embraced Christianity? and are not more glorious times foretold? And does not this confirm, beyond reasonable doubt, that exposition which explains the prophecy of our Lord's coming and kingdom?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The great Builder of the Church, whatever instruments he employs, always works by line and rule; and he knows the dimensions of his holy city, and all those who truly belong to it. But we may boldly apply to him for information about all interesting matters which perplex us: and by his gracious instruction, even the young and inexperienced will be made so wise in the most important concerns, that no man can without great sin despise their youth. The Church of God is so admirably constructed, that, after the millions which have already entered it, "there is yet room" for innumerable millions more: none shall be refused who trust in Christ; and he never excludes from the Church in heaven, one of the true members of the Church on earth. Our desire, prayer, and endeavour, then ought to be, that Jerusalem may be replenished with such numerous converts, that her present limits may be far too narrow, and that the suburbs of this holy city may become far larger than all her present dimensions are.—The inhabitants of Zion need fear no danger or disgrace, however exposed and despised they may be: seeing the LORD will be, "a wall of fire around them, and a glory in the midst of them." We should therefore in our several places circulate his proclamation far and near: that sinners, who are scattered in all parts of the globe, may be brought to separate from their wicked companions, to renounce idolatry, superstition, and iniquity, and join themselves to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, as his worshippers and servants. When he hath displayed his glory in purifying his Church, he will proceed to punish those who have spoiled her. Let all men therefore fear to harm his worshippers: for the least injurious touch will provoke his indignation; and if his wrath be kindled, yea, but a little, and he do but shake his hand over his enemies, misery and contempt will seize upon them; and all the world shall know that the Father hath sent the Son to be the Saviour of his people, and the terrible Judge and Avenger of all, who will not have him to reign over them. Let us then rejoice in his salvation, who now dwells in our nature and abides with his people perpetually: and to whom many nations have already been joined, and all the rest in due time will join themselves. May we be found a part of his chosen inheritance, and yield him a large revenue of praise, honour, and worship: and then he will own us for his portion, and be our Portion in his holy land above. And let all flesh tremble and adore before him: for though he now has taken up his residence in his holy habitation in heaven, and many are ready to inquire, "Where is the "promise of his coming?" yet he will soon arise, and make his cause triumphant, and punish his enemies; and he will ere long come to judgment, to complete the salvation of his people, and to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—4. The prophet next saw "Joshua the high-priest standing before the Angel of the "Lord," (or the Angel JEHOVAH;) as a criminal upon his trial; or rather as Israel's representative, officiating in his ministry, and seeking a blessing upon his afflicted people. While he thus stood before Christ, Satan appeared at his right hand, as his adversary and accuser, to resist him, and to show cause why he should not be accepted in his services, or why he should be condemned: by which the subtle and malicious endeavours of the devil, to discourage the servants of God from their work, or to defeat the success of it, were meant. But the LORD, the Angel JEHOVAH, Christ, before whom Joshua stood, said to Satan, "JEHOVAH rebuke thee, even the LORD, who "hath chosen Jerusalem, rebuke thee," &c. It could not be denied, that Joshua, and the other priests, and the people, were in many things very faulty; but Satan's accusations arose from enmity to God and his cause, and not from any dislike to their unworthiness; and therefore he ought to be rebuked and silenced. They had just been marvellously delivered from idolatrous Babylon, as brands plucked out of the burning; and no wonder if they carried about with them the marks of the fire, in which they had been nearly consumed: yet this was a reason, not why they should be thrown again into it, but why they should be pardoned, and "purified to be a peculiar people zealous "of good works." While the Advocate of the Church thus pleaded against her accuser, the prophet observed, that Joshua was clothed in filthy garments, as he stood before him. This was an emblem of his sinfulness, and that of the people whom he represented: and as he was not properly habited to appear before the Lord, this seemed to give the enemy an advantage. Various conjectures have been formed, concerning the sins of which Joshua had been guilty: but his connivance at the neglect of the people respecting the temple seems the most probable, as far as any particular crime was referred to. The vision, however, rather related to the manifold sins and defilements both of him, the priests, and the people, which the legal sacrifices could not take away. In this situation Joshua had nothing to say in his own behalf; till Christ ordered the attendant angels to remove his filthy garments, assuring him that his sins were pardoned, and "that he would "clothe him with change of raiment." Thus he was prepared for ministering with acceptance in his sacred office; and the people were reminded, that the Aaronic priesthood could not profit them, except by the intervention of a better priesthood, by which iniquity might actually be put away. 'The Logos, or Son of God, said unto Satan, "the LORD," 'even God the Father,' "rebuke thee," &c. (Lowth.)

V. 5. The prophet would doubtless rejoice to see Joshua rescued, cleansed, and arrayed: but he observed that he yet had not the mitre inscribed with "Holiness to "the LORD," which was the peculiar mark of his appointment to the high priesthood. (Marg. Ref.) But he was encouraged to beg that this also might be put upon his head: and his request being granted, Joshua was invested with that as well as the other garments of his office.—Many, however, suppose the first clause to be a continuation of the orders given by the Angel of the LORD:—'And accordingly I command you to set a fair mitre on 'his head.' (Bp. Hall.) 'I, the LORD, further com-'manded, and said, The angel that talked with me 'still stood by, and made that solemn protestation which 'follows.' (Lowth.)

V. 6, 7. When this was done, and Joshua was solemnly admitted to his high office, notwithstanding all former sins; (Notes, Is. vi. 1—9;) the Angel protested to him, or solemnly assured him, with the authority of the LORD of hosts, that if he conscientiously walked in his ways, and faithfully continued to execute the important trust and charge committed to him, he should be honoured as the judge or ruler over the temple and all its services, whilst he lived; and should at length have admission to the company of those attendant spirits which were around the throne.

V. 8. Joshua and the other priests, with Zerubbabel and his assistants, had been men greatly wondered at. Their marvellous deliverance from Babylon; their resolution in coming up to Jerusalem when it lay in ruins; their perseverance in the midst of so many hardships and perils; and their preservation among such inveterate and potent enemies, caused many to think of them with astonishment. But they would surely be preserved; because One was in due time to arise from the remnant of Judah, of whom Joshua was a type, and who was called by the same name; (Joshua being the Hebrew, and Jesus the Greek, termination.) In due time the Lord would bring forth his servant, the BRANCH; namely, at his incarnation, when he would spring forth as a small branch from a decaying root, and yet grow up to supereminent dignity and glory. —'The word, rendered wondered at, signifies not only a 'wonder, but also a sign, or a type. They are men intended as signs and tokens, they are typical men; "men 'that foreshow something to come." 'They, with Joshua 'at the head of them, are a figure of the restoration of 'the Church under the government of the Messiah. I 'will point out the coming of the Messiah, as a person 'altogether distinct from Joshua, or any other present 'among you; and I will make him known under the name 'of the BRANCH. The word is rendered by the Septuagint, the east, or sun-rising, from whence it is ap'plied to Christ, (Luke i. 78.) and rendered the day-'spring.' (Lowth.) How any learned man can suppose that Zerubbabel was exclusively meant, (when he was already brought forth, and placed as high in authority as at any future period,) would be astonishing; did not multiplied instances prove the difficulty with which very learned men discern the Saviour, in the clearest predictions and testimonies of Scripture. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. An allusion might here be made to some corner-stone or foundation stone of the temple, which had been laid under the inspection of Joshua, and in the presence of many of the people; and on which the names of the tribes of Israel perhaps were engraven. But the Lord called their attention to the true Foundation and Corner-stone of the spiritual temple, which he had laid in his purposes and prophecies, and which he would openly lay before the people, in his incarnation and by the Gospel; even Christ, as Immanuel, God and man. The seven eyes upon this stone are interpreted by many to signify the manifold and abundant wisdom and knowledge of Christ, as the Counsellor and ever-watchful Protector of his Church; or the manifold gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit: and some explain it of certain superior ministering angels, so called: but others suppose that they denote the attention which would be paid to this precious Corner-stone. The eyes of all believers from the beginning had looked forward to it, through types and predictions; those of all believers, both of the Jews and Gentiles, after Christ's coming to the end of the world, would be fixed upon it, in faith, hope, and love; wicked men would behold it with contempt, abhorrence, or dismay; and evil spirits would eye it with malignity and despair. In short, the eyes of all, in heaven, earth, or hell, would, in one way or other, or at one time or other, be fixed upon it. The Lord of hosts would engrave the graving of this Stone, as the Corner-stone of the temple had been engraven: this seems especially to refer to the sufferings of Christ, through which he was prepared to be the Foundation and Salvation of the whole Church. On that one day, on which Christ was crucified for his people, a complete atonement was made for all their sins, and the way opened for their pardon, acceptance, and sanctification. And in that day, when sinners come to him, the tried Corner-stone, and obtain pardon, and spiritual life and grace from him, they begin to enjoy peace, and to live in harmony; calling upon one another to associate in religious exercises and in holy fellowship; while they rest under his protection and live upon his consolations; as men used to feast together upon the fruit and under the shade of their vines and fig-trees. This may perhaps have a special reference to that day, when the eyes of the Jews shall be fixed upon Christ, that precious Corner-stone which they have hitherto rejected. Then their load of national guilt shall at once be removed; and they shall enjoy spiritual peace and temporal security in their own land, as in the days of Solomon. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—7.

If we could behold what goes forward in the world of spirits, we should see much to alarm, to humble, and to encourage us. The most honoured, eminent, and excellent of men, when viewed as standing before the Lord, would appear to be sinners deserving of condemnation, not only for their actual sins, but for the defilement of their best services: and Satan would be seen employing a vast variety of subtle and malevolent machinations, to defeat all our pious designs, and even, if possible, to procure our condemnation. But though we cannot answer the charges brought against us, yet our heavenly Advocate never wants an effectual plea, in behalf of all who entrust their cause in his hands. He will rebuke, confound, and silence our bold accuser, by arguments, grounded on his own meritorious obedience unto death, and on the mercy and truth of the Father through him. If it be proved, by our genuine conversion, that we belong to that company, whom he hath chosen, "that they should be holy and without blame "before him in love," we have nothing to fear. We were once as brands in the fire, without sense of our misery and danger, or desire of deliverance; and he plucked us out, of his own unsolicited mercy and grace, "according to the eternal purpose which he had purposed in himself:" and he will not now leave us to be thrown back into the burning, because of those remains of sin, which are our grief and burden, when we stand daily before him, confessing our guilt, entreating him to pardon and cleanse us, and prepared to give him all the glory of our salvation. If the great Intercessor then silences our accuser by such arguments; we should resist his discouraging suggestions in the same manner; we should desire to be the Lord's instruments in plucking brands out of the fire; and we should bear patiently and meekly with the sins and infirmities of new converts and weak believers, according to the mercy of our Lord to us. In his sight we all appear as clothed in filthy garments; not only in our first approach to him for salvation, but in respect of our hearts and actions ever since: except as he orders the poor prodigal to be divested of his rags, and clothed with the best robe, which he hath provided for his change of raiment. When we truly trust in Christ, we shall thus be made the righteousness of God in him; he will also cause our iniquity to pass away by his sanctifying grace, and enable us to put off the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts; and having put on the new man, to walk thenceforth in newness of life. Happy then are they who seek help from him! the prayers of his ministers and people are accepted for them, and they are qualified for every work to which they are called. But if we would have the assurance and comfort of these privileges, and serve the Lord in any honourable and useful station, we must hearken to his protestations concerning the necessity of holiness and faithful obedience, as well as his promises of free salvation. We must learn to walk in his ways, and keep his charge, and be faithful in a little; in order that we may be more and more employed on earth, and in hopes of serving him in heaven for ever, along with angels and perfected saints.

V. 8—10.

Whatever trials we pass through, or whatever services we perform; or however we may be wondered at by friends or foes; our whole dependence must rest on Christ the BRANCH of righteousness; that we may be grafted into him and grow like him. On him must our eyes be fixed, as the only Foundation which the Father hath laid for his Church, or on which a sinner can rest his hope of salvation. He alone can remove our iniquity: in one day he made an all-sufficient atonement for sin, and the Lord laid on him the transgressions of us all: and when his hands, feet, and side were pierced for us, our names and cause were graven by the Father upon his heart. Whenever we look to him in genuine faith, the guilt and power of sin are marvellously removed: we then begin to enjoy true peace and comfort, in communion with him and his saints; and we have an antepast of heavenly felicity, while in his ordinances, by faith and love, "we sit "down under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit "is sweet to our taste." (Cant. ii. 3.)

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. Some short interval taking place, between the foregoing and the following parts of the vision, Zechariah, through the infirmity of the flesh, was fallen asleep. But his divine Instructor waked him, that he might attend to what he had further to show him. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2, 3. (Note, Ex. xxv. 31—37. Rev. i. 20.) This candlestick of pure gold, (alluding to that in the sanctuary,) represented the Church of God, formed of the excellent of the earth, and fitted for receiving, and communicating, the light of truth and holiness, in this dark world. The lamps of the candlestick in the sanctuary were supplied by the priests, in the ordinary manner; but this was supplied in a supernatural way: for there was a bowl, or common reservoir, placed on the top of the candlestick, at an equal distance from each of the seven lamps; and from this bowl were seven pipes, through which the oil gradually ran of itself, to supply each of them, as it was wanted. At the same time, two olive-trees were growing, one on each side of the bowl: and a branch of each of them, being nearest to it, distilled of its own accord abundance of the finest oil, of a golden colour, through a golden pipe into the bowl; from which the lamps were replenished, through the seven pipes, (11, 12.) Beyond doubt, this represented the abundance of divine grace, for the illumination and sanctification of the ministers and members of the Church, which is treasured up in Christ, to be from him dispensed, through his ordinances, to every individual in all parts of the world, as occasions and circumstances may require; and which cannot be procured, or precluded by any human power, but is communicated, according to the methods which he has established, and revealed in his word. This Church was at that time found among the Jews, and the candlestick was set up at Jerusalem: and its light would be supplied and kept burning, notwithstanding the weakness or unworthiness of the persons concerned, the number or power of their enemies, or the apparent difficulties under which they laboured.

5 Then the Angel that talked with me answered and said unto me, [h] Knowest thou not what these be? And I said, [i] No, my lord.

6 Then he answered and spake unto me, saying, This is the word of the LORD unto Zerubbabel, saying, [k] Not by * might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the LORD of hosts.

V. 4—7. The prophet did not understand the vision, but he ventured to inquire the meaning from his gracious Instructor; and being gently reproved for his dulness of apprehension, or his attention being still more excited, he confessed his ignorance, and was left to discover the meaning from the message which he was ordered to deliver to Zerubabbel; assuring him, that his support and success were not to be derived from armies, or human authority, but from the Spirit of God. The power of the Jews, or the authority of the Persian kings, would not avail in these undertakings; but they would be rendered successful by the Holy Spirit. The first edict of Cyrus was procured by the secret operation of God on his mind; Darius and Artaxerxes would be influenced in the same manner to favour them; but especially the instruments employed would not be invested with extensive authority or great power, or endued with military conduct or courage; but with the Spirit of God, rendering them eminent for wisdom, holiness, faith, and zeal, and directing them to proceed in dependence on God. Such in a measure were Zerubbabel, Joshua, and their helpers; such afterwards were Ezra and Nehemiah, and those that concurred with them. By instruments and means of this kind, the temple was rebuilded, and the civil and ecclesiastical state of Judah was restored. Indeed, the obstructions in their way resembled a great mountain, which would be immoveable and insurmountable by any human power: but in the name and strength of that God, who would work by Zerubbabel, he might set them at defiance; for before him the great mountain would become a plain; and he would in time bring forth the head-stone, or the top-stone, to be placed on the summit of the temple: whilst all the people with loud and repeated acclamations would ascribe their whole success to the free, unmerited, and abundant grace and favour of God; as well as seek his continued mercy and grace by fervent prayer. In all this, Zerubbabel doubtless was the type of Christ, who builds his spiritual temple, not by human power and authority, but by the converting, sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit; whilst mountains melt into plains before him, and the work goes on amidst the combined opposition of earth and hell. And thus will he proceed, till the whole multitude of the redeemed shall be perfected, body and soul, in heavenly glory; whilst angels will join the full chorus of the Church triumphant, in adoring praises to that free grace, which formed, conducted, and completed the surprising plan. 'To this 'sense the Chaldee paraphrase expounds the words. His 'Messias shall come forth, who was named from eternity, 'and shall obtain the empire of all the kingdoms of the 'earth. And St. Jerome tells us, that the ancient Jews 'explained it so.' (Lowth.)

V. 8—10. The same truths are here expressed, or illustrated, in another manner. Zerubbabel with his own hands had some time before laid the foundation-stone, in the presence of Joshua and the people: yet, through various hinderances, and discouragements, he probably despaired of seeing the work completed: but he was here assured that his hands should also finish it; and by this he would know, that the Lord had sent his prophet to him; or rather, by this Zechariah would know, that JEHOVAH of hosts, the Father, had sent his divine Instructor to him. "Thou shalt "know," (meaning the prophet,) 'that I am Christ sent 'of my Father, for the building and preservation of my 'spiritual temple.' The aged persons among the Jews had despised these small beginnings, and probably many others concurred with them; and thus they both distrusted the Lord and disheartened one another. Perhaps those in Chaldea, despising such a day of small things, excused themselves from returning into their own land; as if the dawnings of the day of God's returning favour ought not to have been highly valued. Their enemies also despised and ridiculed these feeble efforts. Yet all the friends of the work would at length rejoice, in seeing Zerubbabel successfully and skilfully sustain the character of the master-builder of the temple; and with his plummet in his hand take surveys of the work, to see that it was properly done, until the whole should be completed. This he would do with those seven, which some explain of seven of his principal assistants; but probably it alludes to the seven eyes, that were upon the foundation-stone, (Note, iii. 9.) and which would still watch over and superintend the work, till it was finished. These "were the eyes of the "LORD, &c." His omniscience and manifold wisdom, by which he providentially directs every event all over the earth, would concur with Zerubbabel, and order all things in subserviency to his success. Thus Christ began, continues to build, and will himself complete, his spiritual temple. The small beginnings of his Gospel were despised by numbers: the feeble efforts that are made in different places to promote his cause, and the first dawnings of his grace in new converts, are often contemned. Even the friends of the Gospel are apt to despise the day of small things: but they will all at length rejoice to see this great Builder carry on and complete his design; and to observe how the eyes of the Lord watch over the operations of his grace from first to last; whilst at length angels and men will count them the grand themes of their admiring praise and adoration.

V. 11—14. The prophet was still ignorant of the meaning of the two olive-trees, especially of those branches from which the oil was more immediately conveyed to the lamps: and upon inquiry he learned, that "they were "the two anointed Ones, which stood before the Lord of "the whole earth." Zerubbabel and Joshua, the anointed ruler and high priest of Judah, who stood before the Lord, and were his instruments in the work of the temple, were the anointed Ones intended: but they were only types and shadows, (as the temple itself was,) of him that was to come. They therefore typified Christ, as anointed with the Holy Spirit without measure, to be the King and High-Priest of the Church, and to build, illuminate, and sanctify the spiritual temple. As the anointed High-Priest, he purchased these gifts by his sacrifice of himself, and through his intercession in heaven, they are communicated by him, as the anointed King of his Church. From the union of these two offices in his mysterious person, both God and Man, this inexhaustible fulness of grace is derived and conferred. Thus the olive-branches of themselves distil the golden oil, through the two golden pipes into the bowl: and from this fulness all receive that grace, which they require in their several places and services, through the means of grace, as the seven pipes fed the seven lamps of the candlestick.—'It is plain, that the golden candlestick is the 'Jewish state, both civil and religious: and that the 'oil, with which the lights are supplied, is the Spirit of 'God.' (Bp. Newcombe.)—And is it not equally plain, that Zerubbabel and Joshua were, in these transactions, typical persons, types of Christ our King and our High-Priest?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We are so dull, and so soon weary of attending on spiritual things, that the Lord must not only set them before us, but again and again by various methods awaken our attention.—The Church contains all the knowledge, holiness, and consolation, which are to be found in this sinful world: and all this light comes from Christ, as its great source. He hath formed his candlestick on earth of the most valuable materials, and with the most exquisite workmanship; and he hath so arranged his word, his ordinances, his ministers, and people, that no part of the Church may be destitute of the light of life; and that the whole may shine as a light in the world.—Even when our ignorance or inattention deserve reproofs, if we ask wisdom of him, he will give us liberally, and not upbraid us. No human power or efforts can do good to the souls of men, except the Spirit of God work by them: nor can any authority or might prevent that good, which this divine Agent is pleased to do, often by feeble and unworthy instruments. To spread the Gospel, and to render men wise, holy, and happy, we do not so much need the assistance of mighty monarchs and powerful armies; or that of wealth, great abilities, eminent learning; or even the powers of philosophy, eloquence, and oratory: but we want men filled with the Holy Spirit, full of faith, heavenly wisdom, holiness, zeal for the glory of God, and love to the souls of men; who would go forth in simple dependence on the grace and providence of God, to use (no carnal weapons, but) the spiritual armour provided for them, and by fervent prayer to seek the blessing from him alone. Before such Zerubbabels mountains would become plains; or rather before Him, who hath said "Lo, I am "with you always, even to the end of the world." As his instruments, they would begin and finish many a good work; even as he laid the foundation, and will in due time bring forth the head-stone, of his Church.—In the mean while, may we first give diligence to obtain the assurance that we are a part of the spiritual building; that we may both witness and partake of the blessing, when the whole company of heaven shall exclaim, "Grace, "grace, unto it." Having this assurance, whatever we are called to engage in for the honour of God and the good of the Church, let us use every means diligently, but trust only in the Lord. Let us not be discouraged by mountains in the way, for faith and prayer will not fail to remove them: and let us hope for a happy event to all our endeavours. Nor let us despise the day of small things, either in respect of ourselves or others: for the Lord commonly produces great effects from small beginnings. Rather let us be thankful for every little hope, help, or success, or any little good done by us: let us rejoice to see instruments made active in the Lord's work, either in the magistracy, the ministry, or any other way. Especially let us fix our faith on Christ, and joyfully view him carrying on his work according to his own glorious plan, and daily bringing his spiritual edifice nearer to its completion; whilst the omnipresent and omniscient providence of God concurs with his grace, in perfecting the great

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—4. The preceding visions were replete with encouragement to the pious rulers and people of Judah; but these bear a gloomy aspect, both towards obstinate sinners, and towards the whole nation in process of time.—The prophet's attention was called to a flying roll. He saw several skins of parchment, or other such materials, joined together and written upon, flying in the air; which seemed to him to be above ten yards long and five yards wide: and his divine Instructor informed him, that they represented the curse, which would go through the whole land against wicked persons. The Lord would bring it forth, as the rule of judgment, and he would deal with every one according to it. So that the thief, being condemned by one part of it, would be cut off according to it; the perjured person, being condemned by another part of it, would be cut off according to it: and in like manner, with other criminals. For the curse would enter into the house of the thief, the perjured person, &c. and abide there, till it had destroyed all the riches, comfort, and credit of him and his family; even as if it had consumed the stones and timber of his habitation. The large size of the roll might intimate, that it not only contained all the curses written in the law and denounced by the prophets; but also an account of all the sins of those against whom it was sent forth: its flying might signify, that it continually hovered over, and would speedily light on, the heads of the impenitent: and the two crimes of theft and false swearing might be mentioned as a compendium of the two tables of the law. (Marg. Ref.) 'The roll was very ample, to show what a number of cur- 'ses should come on the wicked.—The thief and the false 'swearer, says Capellus, are put for every kind of trans- 'gressor.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 5—11. This vision seems to be a prediction of the present state of the Jews. Though their prosperity would be restored after the captivity; yet they would at length fill up the measure of their iniquity, and be exposed to a far heavier and more durable calamity than the Baylonish captivity. The prophet being again directed by his divine Instructor to look up, and see what went forth; (that is, from the councils of God, before concealed, but thus revealed;) he was shown an ephah, or a measure about the size of a bushel: and he was told, that "this was their "resemblance through all the earth," or the land. This was the form in which the ephah was made. On the top of the ephah was suspended a talent of lead, as a ponderous cover for it. In the ephah sat a woman, the emblem of the Jewish nation: and the angel cast something into the measure, which he told the prophet was wickedness; denoting that he kept an exact account of their sins, and would put them all with the nation into the measure, and only bear with the people till that should be full: for the emblem requires, and the language implies, that the wickedness put into the ephah should be distinct from the woman. At length the weight of lead was cast on the mouth of the ephah, by which the woman that sat in it, and the wickedness cast into it, would both be so closed up, as no more to be extricated. This seems to mean the condemnation of the nation, after the Jews had filled up the measure of their iniquities by crucifying Christ and rejecting his Gospel. The two women with wings like a stork, and the wind in their wings, seem to have been emblematic of the Roman armies, and their rapid conquests, coming speedily at the call of Christ to execute his righteous sentence on that devoted nation. And the lifting up of the ephah, and carrying it away through the air, to build it an house in Shinar, or Babylon, where it was to be fixed on its own base, so that its condition would for a long time remain unaltered, represents the taking of Jerusalem, the dispersion of the Jews like that made by the Babylonish captivity, and the long continuance of that calamity, as the just punishment of their sins, and by reason of their obstinate unbelief and rejection of Christ, to cleave to the works of their abrogated law and the superstitious traditions of their elders. It is observable, that the word Shinar signifies shaking out, and gives weight to this interpretation, which, in the grand outlines, seems very clear and satisfactory. 'The meaning of 'the vision seems to be, that the Babylonish captivity 'had happened on account of the wickedness committed 'by the Jews; and that a like dispersion would befal 'them, if they relapsed into like crimes.' (Bp. Newcombe.) The language also implies, that it would be vastly more durable.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The full discoveries of the free grace of the Gospel, and the greatest encouragements given to repentance, faith, and evangelical obedience, tend to aggravate the guilt and enhance the punishment of those, who go on still in their wickedness. The tremendous curses of God's word go forth over the face of the whole earth: and they are continually falling upon the heads of the unjust and profane, according to the things written in the book of the law, and in the book of God's omniscience, who will never forget any of their works. While men seek to enrich their families by fraud, rapine, oppression, perjury, or other crimes; they open their doors, and admit the curse into their habitations along with their ill-gotten gains; and it will there remain, to the ruin of their substance, and the impoverishing of their posterity; while another part of the same curse will rest on their souls, and sink them into everlasting punishment. As we are all transgressors of the law, so we cannot escape this wrath of God, except we flee for refuge to the hope set before us in the Gospel. To give us space for this, the Lord endures our provocations with much long-suffering: but there is an appointed measure for every individual, (as well as for every nation,) in which he sits, and into which all his wickedness is cast: and when he hath filled this measure, the Lord will shut him up under his heavy wrath, as with a talent of lead, and commission the executioners of his vengeance to carry him to his own place, there to assign him his long home, far from the city of our God, and among his enemies, as a vessel of wrath fitted for destruction. There will he be "established on his own base," and continue for ever a hater of God and holiness, and an object of his unchangeable and hot displeasure. Let sinners then fear to treasure up wrath against this day of wrath; for the more they multiply their crimes, the faster the measure fills: let them especially take heed not to oppose, despise, or neglect the great salvation of the Gospel; for this, above all other sins, hastens and ratifies the tremendous sentence; and whilst the day continues, "Let the wicked forsake his ways, and "the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return to "the LORD, and he will have mercy upon him, and to our "God, for he will abundantly pardon."

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—8. 'The two brazen mountains 'may be merely an ornamental part of the vision; or they 'may denote God's firm and immutable decrees, by which 'he governs the earth. "His righteousness is like great "mountains." (Bp. Newcombe.) The emphasis laid on the mountains being mountains of brass, sufficiently proves, that something essential to the vision was intended. The four chariots are generally interpreted of the four great monarchies, the Chaldean, Persian, Grecian, and Roman, which successively executed God's purposes of justice and mercy. As the red horses mentioned at first are afterwards omitted, it is supposed to be intimated, that the first of those monarchies was already subverted; and the bay horses, which are first joined with the grisled, but afterwards mentioned separately, are supposed to denote the Goths, Vandals, &c. which subverted the Roman empire. But the reasons assigned for the different colours of the horses, from the different complexions, (so to speak) of these monarchies, do not give entire satisfaction. Certainly the Persian monarchy was more favourable to the Jews, than any of the others; and it does not seem to have been more fatal to other nations. And whatever favours Alexander the Great showed to the Jews, the sufferings of that nation, under some of his successors, especially Antiochus Epiphanes, exceeded all which they endured from the Babylonish captivity till the coming of Christ. The white horses, therefore, are not, in this respect, a proper emblem of the Grecian empire. Nor does it appear, for what end the Chaldean monarchy should be represented in a prophetical vision; seeing it was already destroyed. It seems then more obvious and satisfactory, to explain the passage to be descriptive of the providential government of God, as conducted by the ministration of angels according to his eternal purposes: and this with special reference to the affairs of the Jews and surrounding nations at that time, (Notes, 7—11.) Angels are called the Lord's chariots; (Notes, Ps. lxviii. 17. Ez. i. x.) By them he goes forth to execute his providential will on earth. The chariot with red horses may represent the execution of his vengeance, by raising up bloody conquerors to waste guilty nations: that with black horses the dreadful judgments of famine and pestilence, which often follow the desolations of war: the white horses may signify the removal of those judgments, by returning peace, health, and plenty: and the grisled and bay may denote dispensations mingled with wrath and mercy; or those lighter judgments that are more common in the world. (Notes, Rev. vi. 2—8.) Accordingly, the Angel interpreted the vision to signify "the four spirits "of the heavens;" that is, celestial spirits, sent forth from God, to execute his purposes in the different parts of the earth. The red had already gone forth, and were executing their commission, in the wars by which the Persian kings wasted the Chaldeans and other nations in those parts: the black were about to follow them into the north-country; and then the white would go forth after them. But the grisled were about to go towards the south, into Egypt, and other countries to the south of Judah: yet the bay, which were connected with them, sought to go to and fro through the earth, and obtained permission so to do. 'Those which were represented by the bay, (not be-'ing designed to any particular place,) went forth to pass 'to and fro throughout the earth, to take charge of the 'Church of God, scattered in all parts of the world.' (Bp. Hall.) At length the prophet's divine Instructor informed him, that they who had gone towards the north-country had quieted his spirit respecting those regions: the judgments inflicted on those who had harassed the Jews, having satisfied the justice of God, he was appeased, and willing that peace should be restored.

Then cried, &c. 'These words were uttered by God, 'appearing out of the Shekinah.' (Lowth.) This is certainly a mere assertion: for the text contains no hint to that effect. The Angel, who talked with the prophet, evidently spake in this as well as former instances: and the passage unanswerably shows, that, according to the interpretation before given, this Angel was the LORD of Hosts, the mighty God, Emmanuel. Thus was concluded that succession of visions, which is continued from the first chapter to this place.

V. 9. Came, &c. 'After the night, on which the 'eight foregoing visions were represented to the prophet.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 10, 11. These persons seem to have come from Babylon, to present an oblation from the Jews at Babylon towards the building or decoration of the temple: but it is not certain whether they intended to continue at Jerusalem, or to return to Babylon. The prophet, however, was ordered to meet them on that very day at the house of Josiah, whither perhaps they were gone to present their oblation; and of them he was to take the silver and gold, and to make crowns. With these he was ordered to crown Joshua the high priest: not with respect to his personal character; for he exercised no regal authority, as Zerubbabel was the civil governor, being the deputy of the king of Persia; but as he was in this transaction a type of Christ. 'Two crowns of gold are ordered here to be 'made, and both of them to be placed on the head of 'Joshua, to signify, that the Messiah, of whom Joshua 'was a type, should be both a King and a Priest; and so 'should have a right to wear the two crowns that belong 'to each of these officers.' (Lowth.) Some think, that one crown was made of gold and the other of silver: but others suppose that the silver was employed for other sacred uses. As the high-priest's crown, inscribed with HOLINESS TO THE LORD, was made of pure gold; the emblem seems to require this interpretation. (Marg. Ref.) —'Josiah was probably a worker in gold and silver.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 12, 13. 'See in the person of Joshua the high-'priest, the type and representation of the Man, whose 'name is the Christ that shall be revealed, as the Targum 'paraphrases the text.' (Lowth.) Joshua was directed, by this typical action, to behold the "Man whose name "is the BRANCH;" the divine Saviour, who would in due time assume human nature, as a branch from the root of Jesse. He would certainly grow up out of his place, from a virgin of the family of David, in the city of Bethlehem, where he would be born; and then from small beginnings he would grow up to extraordinary greatness and honour. He, and he only, would build the true temple of the LORD, (of which Solomon's temple, and that which Zerubbabel and Joshua were building, were types;) consisting of the whole company of redeemed sinners, quickened and converted by divine grace, and made "an habi-"tation of God through the Spirit." He would bear and be able to sustain the exceeding weight of that glory, which would redound to him, as having planned and erected this spiritual edifice. For after his humiliation on earth, he would be advanced in human nature to the mediatorial throne, "angels, principalities, and powers, being "made subject to him;" "all power in heaven and earth "being given to him;" and all the fulness of the Godhead dwelling in him, in order to the completion of this great design; of which he will have the whole glory from all the company of the redeemed, and from the angels in heaven, to all eternity. On this throne he would be established, till all enemies should be put under his feet. And he would be a Priest as well as a King upon his throne. His royal dignity in human nature would be the recompense of his humiliation and sacrifice as a Priest: he would still officiate as Priest, by his intercession within the veil; his royal dignity would add splendour and efficacy to his priestly ministrations: "and thus the counsel "of peace would be between them both." Some indeed explain this of the eternal counsel of redemption between the Father and the Son, concerning the reconciliation and salvation of the elect; but doubtless it signifies, that the counsel of God would be fulfilled by this union of the kingdom and priesthood in Christ. The former had been confined to the family of David, the latter to that of Aaron; from them Zerubbabel and Joshua were risen, and they concurred in building the temple. But One would at length arise, after the order of Melchizedek, who would be a Priest upon a throne, and unite the two distinct offices in his single person; of which the crowning of Joshua was a type. As a Priest, he would offer an atoning sacrifice, and expiate sin, and then make intercession for sinners: as a King, he would rule, enact laws, execute judgment, conquer and destroy his enemies; protect and exalt his people: and thus the counsel of peace would be accomplished by this union of the two offices in our Prince of peace. And as the prophets were always subservient to the pious kings and priests, in the execution of their offices; so the prophetical office of Christ makes him known in his kingly and priestly offices. This was understood of the Messiah in the days of our Saviour. 'Herod had a 'mind to be thought the Messias; his flatterers had put 'this thought into his head, who from thence were called 'Herodians, as many of the ancient writers suppose. 'This put him upon rebuilding the temple.' (Lowth.)

V. 14, 15. After these crowns had been put on the head of Joshua, they were to be placed in the temple, for a memorial of the transaction, and of the piety of those men who had presented the gold of which they were made. —Helem seems to have been the same person as Heldai, and Hen, the son of Zephaniah, as Josiah. Perhaps these names were inscribed on the crowns. And, as they came from a great distance to bring this oblation, so it was foretold, that they that were far off would come and build in the temple of the Lord; either as instruments in the hands of the great Builder, (Notes, 1 Cor. iii. 9—12.) or as coming to be made a part of the spiritual building. Thus they would know the truth of the prophet's mission. —Some reference may be had to the assistance afforded by the Jews who lived in distant countries, and even by gentile princes in building the material temple: but this typified the calling of the Gentiles into the Church, and the usefulness of many Gentile converts in promoting its extent, purity, and prosperity. These things would come to pass, "if they diligently obeyed the voice of the LORD," &c.—'And ye of the Jewish nation shall be first sharers 'in the benefits arising from Christ's kingdom and priest-'hood, (and then those that are far off,) if you diligently 'hearken to the voice of God speaking to you, both by his 'prophets and by his Son.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All the diversified events that take place in the world, spring from the unchangeable counsels of God, which are formed in unerring wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness. "His counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure;" "and none can stay his hand, or say to him, what doest "thou?" He might justly fill the earth with unmingled wo; but he moderates the severity of his vengeance, as far as consists with the honour of his justice, and when his judgments have "quieted his spirit," as provoked by man's daring rebellions. His angels delight in executing his mandates of wrath, or of mercy. While they seek to go forth, they wait his orders, and exactly conform to his will: and as we hope shortly to be equal to them, we should now study and copy their examples. If insuperable hinderances prevent men from giving personal assistance to pious and good designs, it is well, when they are willing to contribute towards them from their substance: and when such services spring from faith and love, they will remain for a memorial to their benefit in the temple of the Lord above. Yet nothing can be accepted of sinners, but what is presented in dependence on Christ, our Priest and King. 'For us men and for our Salvation he came down 'from heaven and became incarnate,' and grew as a Branch out of a dry ground, till he arose to his pre-eminent dignity and glory; showing us, that humiliation and self-abasement are the first steps towards true glory and honour. To him, the great Builder, as well as Foundation, of the temple, all the glory belongs, and shall be rendered for ever. We must both submit to him as our King, trust in him as our Priest, and give him all the glory of our salvation; if we would have the new covenant ratified with us, and its blessed peace communicated to our hearts and consciences. Let us not think of separating what God hath joined together in his counsel of peace; for we cannot obey Christ as our King, unless we come to God by him as our Priest: nor come to God by him as our Priest, if we refuse to have him reign over us as our King. We have heard the Gospel of peace, through the blood of his cross, in these distant regions: but are we come to him and built on him, as a part of his spiritual temple, or are we yet the palace of Satan? Are we endeavouring to promote the purity and prosperity of this temple? or do we defile it by our sins? Certainly we can have no comfortable ground to think our peace made with God, unless we diligently endeavour to obey his voice, and keep his commandments.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1. This transaction occurred above two years after the visions recorded in the foregoing chapters: but the prophet doubtless continued to instruct and exhort the people during that time, though none of his predictions were recorded. Chisleu, the ninth month, answered to part of November and part of December.

V. 2, 3. 'The verb in the Hebrew is singular, "He "had sent;" 'but our interpreters render it plurally, by 'an enallage of the number, which is frequent in the 'Hebrew; and the vulgar Latin interprets it to the same 'sense. According to this syntax, the words might be 'as well translated thus, "When Sharezar, and Regem-"melech, and their men, sent unto the house of God."—'These probably were men of some note among the Jews 'that still continued at Babylon.' (Lowth.) Either the Jews in Chaldea, or those in Judah, sent the persons here mentioned, with their attendants, to the temple, both to offer prayers in their behalf, and to propose a question to the priests and prophets, concerning some fasts which they had been used to observe. They kept an annual fast in the fourth month, in remembrance of the breaking down of the wall of Jerusalem; another in the fifth month, in remembrance of the burning of the temple; another in the seventh month, on the day on which Gedaliah was slain; and another in the tenth month, because at that time the siege of the city was begun. (Marg. Ref.) But the Jews now questioned, whether they ought to continue the observance of these fasts, seeing the city and temple were both in a fair way of being rebuilt. They had wept for their sins, and separated themselves from food and ordinary recreations and employments, that they might spend the day in devotions, and they had persevered in it for many years; but must they still thus deny themselves?

4 Then came the word of the LORD of hosts unto me, saying,

5 Speak unto all the people of the land, and to the priests, saying, When ye fasted and mourned in the fifth and [i] seventh month, even those [k] seventy years, [l] did ye at all fast unto me, even to me?

6 And when ye did eat, and when ye did drink, * did not ye eat for yourselves, and drink for yourselves?

7 † Should ye not hear the words which the LORD hath [m] cried by the ‡ former prophets, when Jerusalem was inhabited and in prosperity, and the cities thereof round about her, when men inhabited [n] the south and the plain?

8 ¶ And the word of the LORD came unto Zechariah, saying,

9 Thus speaketh the LORD of hosts, [o] saying, ◊ Execute true judgment, and shew mercy and compassions every man to his brother:

10 And [p] oppress not the widow, nor the fatherless, the stranger, nor the poor; and let none of you [q] imagine evil against his brother in your heart.

11 But [r] they refused to hearken, and ‖ pulled away the shoulder, [s] and * stopped their ears, that they should not hear.

12 Yea, they made † their hearts as an adamant stone, [u] lest they should hear the law, and the words which the LORD of hosts hath [x] sent in his Spirit by † the former prophets: [y] therefore came a great wrath from the LORD of hosts.

13 Therefore it is come to pass, that [z] as he cried, and they would not hear; [a] so they cried, and I would not hear, saith the LORD of hosts:

14 But I [b] scattered them with a whirlwind among all the nations [c] whom they knew not. Thus [d] the land was desolate after them, that no man passed through nor returned: for they laid the [e] pleasant ‡ land desolate.

V. 4—7. Whoever originally proposed the question, it evidently concerned the whole nation: and therefore the Lord sent his prophet to the people and priests on the occasion. The fasts which they had observed were not of divine appointment; though the observance of them would have been good, had they uprightly kept them. But they were not truly humbled or sorry for those sins that had provoked the wrath of God against them: and whilst they wept as sufferers, they did not submit to his justice in their sufferings, or seek his mercy for their deliverance. They were not truly penitent; they did not forsake their sins: the glory and favour of God were not their grand object; their fasting was the result of self-righteousness, or ostentation; or a matter of custom, a form, a compliance with human authority, out of regard to ease, interest, or reputation; and it had no salutary effects upon their temper and conduct: so that they pleased themselves as really, when they wept and fasted, as when they feasted in a sensual and ungodly manner. But whether they fasted or not, they ought certainly to have attended to the earnest calls of the Lord by the former prophets, to repentance and reformation. If their fathers had done this, their ancient prosperity would have been continued; and nothing but this could re-establish them in their former flourishing condition. 'Did you fast upon religious motives, and 'for your better improvement in the duties of repentance 'and amendment? When ye did eat, ye sought your own 'pleasure and convenience, not my glory.' "Are not "these the words, &c." (Marg.) 'The prophet puts 'them in mind of the exhortations the prophets before 'the captivity gave them; that they may lay them to 'heart, and not be guilty of the same sins, for fear of 'incurring the same penalties. From the eleventh year 'of Zedekiah, to the fourth year of Darius Hystaspis, 'are just seventy years.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)—'When ye offered sacrifices, after which ye feasted, did 'ye not in this religious act, regard yourselves more than 'me? Did not the former prophets make like declara-'tions, concerning the inefficacy of your external obser-'vances? Did they not insist on the superior excellence 'of moral duties?' (Bp. Newcombe.) 'He showeth that 'they did not fast of a sincere heart, but for hypocrisy;— 'because they lacked those offices,' (duties of charity,) 'which should have declared that they were godly.' (Matt. xxiii. 23.)

V. 8—10. 'I often put your fathers in mind, that 'judgment and mercy were more acceptable to me than 'fasting, or any external performances: and I repeat the 'same admonition to you of the present age.' (Lowth.)

V. 13. The people cried for temporal deliverance, when the sentence, (as to the destruction of the city and the captivity,) had become irreversible; and therefore God would not hear them: but if any of them, even at that time, cried to him for spiritual salvation in humble faith, he certainly answered them. original.' (Bp. Newcombe.) "The land of desire is "for a desolation." The contrast is striking.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If we would know the will of God in doubtful cases, we must not only consult his word and ministers, but seek his direction by fervent prayer. Some duties are obligatory at all times, and others belong to special seasons. It behooves those who are suffering or trembling because of their sins, to weep and fast, and separate themselves from lawful pleasures, to attend to the great business of humbling themselves before God, and seeking forgiveness: and it is equally seasonable for those who have experienced signal deliverances and special tokens of his reconciling love, to abound in praise, and in every expression of grateful joy. But most men rest in the outside of these religious exercises; and whether they fast and pray, or eat and drink, they do it to themselves, according to their own humour, or for their own honour or interest, in one way or other. Yet they are in general so pleased with their performances, that they think it hard that God will not richly reward what they "did not at all to him," and what in fact he abhors as the result of pride, selfishness, and hypocrisy! Nay, many, who with apparent conscientiousness inquire the truth and will of God, prove indisposed to embrace the one, or to practise the other. But the neglect of moral duties is as inconsistent with sincerity in religious observances, as the neglect of religion is inconsistent with the practice of morality, from a single eye to the glory and will of God. Our rule is, that "whether we eat or "drink, or whatever we do, we do all to the glory of "God;" and true Christians will aim to receive all with that thankfulness, and use all with that moderation which may render even their meals honourable to his name: but they will feel that they continually fall short of their rule, and need forgiveness in every thing. What then must be the case with them whose very religion is as selfish as their banquetings and revellings? Wilful disobedience mars the prosperity of cities, and of apparently flourishing Churches; and no mourning or fasting under public or personal rebukes will prove of real use, except the ground of the Lord's controversy be removed. In this all his servants in every age are agreed. Except magistrates execute true judgment, and private persons do justice and show mercy and compassions to their brethren; except they cease to oppress the widow, the fatherless, the strangers, and the poor of every name or nation; except men repress their resentments, and forbear to imagine evil against their brethren in their hearts; they evidently refuse to hearken to the warnings of God's word, and to bear the yoke of his commandments; they increase the natural hardness of their stony hearts, by resisting convictions, and indulging their prejudices, lest they should hear the law and the words of the LORD by his Spirit in his prophets; and they cannot expect that even their prayers will turn away the great wrath of the Lord from them. He indeed always readily hears the cry of the broken-hearted penitent: yet it will soon come to pass, in respect of all who die impenitent and unbelieving, that "as he cried, and they would not hear, so "they will cry, and he will not hear or help them." And then there will be no remedy, or refuge, from those miseries, which here they despised and defied, but which they then will not be able to endure. (Marg. Ref.)

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 2. The Lord had been exceeding jealous for his people, and displeased with their enemies; (i. 14;) and he had already in part avenged them on the Chaldeans and their other enemies, with great fury.—This is the general interpretation, but perhaps the verse, in this connexion, has another meaning. 'I have been 'jealous against Zion, with a vehement jealousy: and I 'have been angry against her with great fury.' Zion, the Church of the Jews, acted as an adulterous wife; and the calamities which she had endured were the effects of the Lord's jealousy and indignation: but he was now about to return to her in mercy. A grammatical rule of the Hebrew is indeed supposed to be contrary to this construction, but it certainly admits of exceptions. (Ps. cvi. 15.)

V. 3. A city, &c. That is, a city in which divine truth was known and believed; the true God worshipped in the appointed manner, and in sincerity; and where fidelity, as well as justice and equity, was practised among men. This primarily related to the state of Jerusalem, as reformed by Zerubbabel, Joshua, Ezra, Nehemiah, and others; yet it was typical of the Gospel-Church of true believers, which alone can fully answer to these characters.

5 And all the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls, [g] playing in the streets thereof.

6 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, If it be * marvellous in the eyes of the remnant of this people in these days, [h] should it also be marvellous in mine eyes? saith the LORD of hosts.

7 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, Behold, [i] I will save my people from the east country, and from the † west country:

8 And I will bring them, [k] and they shall dwell in the midst of Jerusalem: [l] and they shall be my people, and I will be their God, in truth and in righteousness.

9 ¶ Thus saith the LORD of hosts, [m] Let your hands be strong, ye that hear in these days these words by the mouth of [n] the prophets, which were in the day that the foundation of the house of the LORD of hosts was laid, that the temple might be built.

10 For [o] before these days ‡ there was no hire for man, nor any hire for beast; [p] neither was there any peace to him that went out or came in, because of the affliction: [q] for I set all men every one against his neighbour.

11 But now [r] I will not be unto the residue of this people as in the former days, saith the LORD of hosts.

12 For [s] the seed shall be § prosperous; the vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase, and [t] the heavens shall give their dew: and I will cause [u] the remnant of this people [x] to possess all these things.

13 And it shall come to pass, that as ye were [y] a curse among the heathen, [z] O house of Judah, and house of Israel; so will I save you, [a] and ye shall be a blessing: [b] fear not, but let your hands be strong.

14 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, [c] As I thought to punish you, when your fathers provoked me to wrath, saith the LORD of hosts, [d] and I repented not:

15 So again [e] have I thought in these days to do well unto Jerusalem and to the house of Judah: [f] fear ye not.

V. 4, 5. These verses are beautifully descriptive of a state of great outward tranquillity, attended with plenty, temperance, and contentment. The inhabitants of the city are supposed to live to extreme old age, and to walk cheerfully and without fear in the streets; whilst their numerous descendants, being healthful and lively, free from want, fear or sorrow, amicably engage in their childish diversions on every side of them; a sight extremely pleasing to those aged spectators. 'The walls of 'Jerusalem were not dedicated, till above sixty years after 'this prophecy.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 6. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7, 8. 'This denotes the general restoration of the 'Jewish nation, from their several dispersions. The west 'country hath a particular reference to their present 'dispersion, great numbers of them having settled in the 'western parts of the world. They shall constantly serve 'and worship me, and I will bless and protect them.' (Lowth.) The passage, in its full import, must be interpreted either of the Christian Church, or the future restoration of the Jews. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9—15. The Jews, who had heard and obeyed the words of Haggai and Zechariah, when they called them to build the temple, were encouraged to proceed in that work with vigour and alacrity. While this had been neglected, there had been no profitable employment for those who wished to subsist by the labour of their hands, or by that of their cattle; nor could they travel from place to place in safety, because of the calamities of the times; for the Lord had been provoked to leave them exposed to their enemies, and even to quarrel with each other. But he now intended remarkably to prosper them, beyond the example of all former days. Their lands should bring forth abundance, and they should possess it in peace; and the heathen, who had deemed them a contemptible, wretched, and accursed people, and treated them accordingly, beholding their wonderful deliverances and prosperity, should consider them as an honourable and happy nation. For as nothing could prevent the execution of his purposed wrath upon their fathers: so nothing should interrupt the course of his promised mercy towards them.—The consideration that all the nations, which now worship the true God and receive the Scriptures as his word, have derived all their knowledge in divine things, and all their privileges, under God, from Jewish prophets, apostles, and teachers; and that the Saviour, "in whom all nations "shall be blessed," sprang from that favoured race, emphatically explains what is meant, when the Lord says, "Ye shall be a blessing." (Marg. Ref.) 'The mentioning of both Judah and Israel, which had been so long 'separated, shows that both the curse and the blessing 'here spoken of, in the ultimate sense, belong to the whole 'body of the Jews; who, as they are a public instance of 'God's judgments now, so shall they hereafter be of his 'blessings; viz: at the general restoration and conversion 'of the nation.' (Lowth.) It may be added, that this event will be "as life from the dead" to all the nations, and the Jews shall then indeed be a blessing.

16 ¶ These [g] are the things that ye shall do; [h] Speak ye every man the truth to his neighbour; * execute the judgment of truth and peace in your gates:

17 And [i] let none of you imagine evil in your hearts against his neighbour; and [k] love no false oath: for all these are [l] things that I hate, saith the LORD.

V. 16, 17. (Marg. Ref.) Let those who believe these promises, show their faith by their works, and wait the fulfilment of them, in an obedient tenour of conduct, as magistrates and as private persons. The false oath might be loved, not only because of the gain acquired by it, but also from contempt of God, and enmity against him.

V. 19. Love the, &c. Or, "Ye shall love the truth "and peace." As in many other similar passages, the implied exhortation is proposed in the form of a promise. (Note, Ez. xxxvi. 25—27.) Whilst the Jews had neglected the truths of God's words and his true worship, and whilst they deceived, defrauded, and quarreled with each other, God had given them occasion for mournful fasts: but he had now promised to change these into cheerful feasts, and he therefore exhorted them to love truth and peace, as the proper method of perpetuating their comforts and mercies.

V. 20—23. 'These verses refer to the great accession 'of converts, which the Jewish Church received, between 'the captivity and the coming of Christ; to the number 'of Christian disciples which the Jewish preachers made; 'and to the future conversions, of which the restoration 'of the Jews will be an eminent cause.' (Bp. Newcombe.) Notwithstanding all the miseries that the Jews had long endured, and the reproach and weakness which still attended them; it would at length come to pass, that numbers of persons from many cities would come to court their friendship. For the inhabitants of one city should go to those of another, purposely to persuade them to go with them without delay, to pray before JEHOVAH, the God of Israel, and to seek his favour, offering to accompany them in so doing. In this manner many people, yea, powerful nations, would come to Jerusalem to seek and worship JEHOVAH, and to lay hold on the skirt of a Jew; 'a ges-'ture naturally used to entreat assistance and protection.' (Bp. Newcombe.) For they had been told that God was, in an especial manner, present with that people. This is indeed a clear prediction of the most extraordinary and unlikely event, which, at the time when Zechariah delivered it, could be imagined: namely, that many nations, powerful nations, renowned for arts and arms, for civilization and philosophy; nations, which had successively subjugated and oppressed Israel; nations, that had despised and ridiculed, with unbounded scorn, the worshippers of JEHOVAH; would at length learn religion from that very people! The Jews, when prosperous in their own land, were exceedingly prone to embrace the idolatries of the surrounding nations: what then could be more improbable, or more contrary to general observation, than that, after they had been crushed and enslaved, by successive conquerors, they should at length become teachers of true religion to their oppressors, and to the nations of the earth? Yet this is expressly foretold, with emphatical repetition and variation of circumstances! The term Jew, or Judean, became the more general national appellation, from the Babylonish captivity: and we have had repeated occasions to remark, that the prophets foretold the conversion of the Gentiles, in language taken from the stated religious worship of their own times. (Notes, Is. lxvi. 19—23. Ez. xl. 2.) It is, therefore, here evidently foretold, that at least ten times as many Gentiles would be converted to the true religion, as there were Jews, properly so called, among them at the time when the prophecy should begin to be fulfilled. The astonishing interposition of God in behalf of his people, at Babylon and Susa, &c. (Esther, iii—ix. Dan. ii—vi;) and the translation of the Scriptures into Greek, and the wide dispersion of them in that language, no doubt had considerable effects; but effects far beneath the language here used. For this certainly can mean nothing less, than that many powerful nations, of all languages, would renounce idolatry, become the worshippers of the God of the Jews, and learn the way of salvation from them, with the grand peculiarities of their religion: and that they would look up to the Jews, as a people peculiarly blessed by the presence and favour of God, and press with great earnestness to share their privileges. This and much more is foretold: and accordingly it is an undeniable fact, that Greece and Rome, Egypt, and vast multitudes in Assyria, Persia, renowned countries both in the east and the west, by the propagation of the Gospel, renounced their idols, became the worshippers of JEHOVAH, and took the Jewish Scriptures as his sacred oracles. In process of time, whole nations embraced Christianity: and all the knowledge of the true God, and of true religion in the world, is derived from Judah, by the Saviour, the Glory of Israel and the Light of the Gentiles, through the writings and preaching of Jewish prophets, apostles, and evangelists: nor is there the least genuine knowledge of God in the world at this day, which may not be traced back to that source, and that method of communication. And, no doubt, when the Lord shall render his cause universally triumphant, all the ministers will draw their instructions from the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, the whole of which, (excepting Job,) were written by the descendants of Israel. For, though it pleased God to employ Gentile converts, as preachers, pastors, and teachers, in the primitive times, yet none were honoured as writers in the New Testament. And it is highly probable, that numbers of the converted Jews will be employed, and greatly prospered, in the future conversion of the Gentiles. Hitherto, however, the prophecy has been most wonderfully and exactly accomplished, and future events will no doubt throw still further light upon it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

The unchangeable love and faithful engagements of God to his people form their only and their sufficient security, that no enemy shall prevail against them, or injure them with impunity: and his gracious presence with his Church alone renders her worthy to be called "the city of truth "and the mountain of holiness." Godliness and honesty conduce exceedingly to peace and prosperity in cities and nations. It is beautiful to behold the old and young living amicably and comfortably together; and we ought to be thankful to behold our children healthful and cheerful, and engaged in those diversions which suit their tender age, without any cause of terror or complaint: but it is most desirable to see "young men and maids, old men and "children," with one accord joining in the worship and service of God, as citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem. If, in the present low state of vital godliness, we can scarcely conceive how such a change can be effected as to render it general all over the earth, let us not conclude that it cannot be: for it is no marvellous thing in the eyes of the Lord, that such a revolution should be effected; and the almighty power of his new creating Spirit could produce it in less time, than he was pleased to employ in creating the world. When he pleases thus to work, he will save multitudes in all parts of the world, and they will become citizens of his holy city, and his obedient people; and he will be their God in truth and righteousness: for while he performs his promises, and makes them partakers of his salvation, they will learn to serve him in righteousness and true holiness. Let then the hands of all those be strong, who are labouring to promote the cause of the Gospel; for while they attend to the words of his prophets and apostles, they may be sure that their labour will not be in vain. But let us not forget, that we best consult our own interest, by giving the service of God a decided priority in our choice and endeavours. When he is provoked by men's procrastination or negligence, he can cause trade to decay, and peace to remove, and set every man against his neighbour: but when he returns in mercy, peace and plenty result from his smile, and they become most prosperous, honoured, and happy, who were most abject and miserable.

V. 16—23.

While we rely on the Lord's promises, we ought also to consider what are the things that we ought to do. Surely Christians should remember the exhortation to "put away lying, and to speak every man truth with his "neighbour;" to execute the judgments of truth and peace, to abhor all malice, fraud, and perjury; to hate what the Lord hates, and to love what he delighteth in. When they thus serve him, and he turns their mourning for sin into joy and gladness, and divine ordinances become their cheerful feasts, and they evidently love truth and peace; then they appear amiable, excellent, wise, and happy; their light shines before men; they adorn and recommend the doctrine of God our Saviour, and convince all around them that the Lord is with them of a truth: and thus supported and elevated, a cottage, a dungeon, a death-bed, a fiery furnace, or a lion's den, may be the scene of great peace and enjoyment. In this way the ancient servants of God attracted the attention and admiration of their heathen neighbours: thus they softened their prejudices, and insinuated themselves into their affections, whilst they saw what manner of men they were among them for their sakes; and so Christianity was diffused through many powerful and prosperous nations. The same cause would again produce the same effect: and when Christians shall generally cease from their sharp contentions, renounce unscriptural tenets and practices, and show their love of truth and peace in the whole tenour of their conduct, we may expect a more extensive spread of true religion, than any that yet hath taken place. In the mean time, let us stir up ourselves and each other, to go and pray before the Lord, and seek his face: let us strive to make known his truth in dark places, and to give weight to exhortation by example.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1. This chapter begins another prophecy, which reaches to the end of the eleventh: and it opens with predictions of judgments upon several nations bordering upon the Jews. This burden of the LORD first related to Hadrach: Syria is doubtless intended; but it is not certain whether Hadrach was the name of some idol, or of some place in Syria; or for what reason it was thus called. This burden, however, would fall, and rest, or abide on Damascus, the capital of Syria: and the prophecy was fulfilled by Alexander, who seized on immense riches in that city, and his successors, who governed it as conquerors: and it is not foretold of Damascus, as of Tyre, that the city should be destroyed. These events would take place, "when the eyes of man, as of all the tribes of "Israel, should be toward the LORD;" which may denote, that these troubles would continue till the coming of Christ when the eyes of men in general, as those of all the tribes of Israel, should be fixed upon the true God, expecting help and salvation from him: and it might intimate, that the Syrians would not be delivered, till they were converted to Christianity and became worshippers of Israel's God. Or it may mean, that this burden would rest on Damascus, when the eyes of men, even of all the tribes of Israel, would be towards the Lord; by whom they would be protected, when their neighbours were reduced. When the Jews saw the conqueror approach, they looked to God and implored his protection: and Jaddua, the high-priest, met Alexander in his pontifical robes, who received him very graciously. Some learned men have endeavoured to show, that this and the two following chapters were not written by Zechariah, but before his time. Their arguments, however, do not bring conviction, to my mind at least. They urge, that it was not at all likely for Zechariah to predict the destruction of the temple, when encouraging the Jews to build it; (xi. 1.) but did not God, by Moses, predict the dispersion of Israel, while encouraging them to go up and possess the promised land? (Deut. xxviii—xxxii.) Did not the Lord foretel to Solomon the destruction of the temple, through the sins of the people, even when it had just before been dedicated? And did not Daniel, a considerable time before Zechariah began to prophesy, foretel the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, and the judgments of God on his people within seventy weeks; on the very day when his prayer was heard for the rebuilding of the temple, and the restoration of Jerusalem? (Notes, Dan. ix.) It is certain, that Tyre was very affluent and powerful, when Alexander the Great took and destroyed it: and why should not that judgment, and not the desolations by Nebuchadnezzar, be predicted? The arguments, indeed, adduced in favour of this opinion, would not have been much noticed, had they not been sanctioned by eminent names: but, one thing above all others, satisfies my mind, that the opinion is unfounded; namely that they who do not allow, that Zechariah delivered these predictions, are not agreed to whom they should be ascribed, or what date to assign them. Some argue that Jeremiah was the writer of them; but others carry back many parts of them to a far earlier period. In fact, the whole book has been ascribed to Zechariah by the Jews, in every age: and it is rather remarkable, that some, who frequently suppose errors of transcribers, and propose conjectural amendments, should be influenced by what probably was an error of a transcriber, (Note, xi. 12—14. Matt. xxvii. 9,) to assign part of this book to Jeremiah, or to some preceding prophet, contrary to the constant tradition both of the Jewish and Christian Church.

V. 2—4. Hamath bordered on Syria on one hand, and Tyre and Zidon on the other, and they would share her burden. The Tyrians deemed themselves exceedingly wise; they had strongly fortified the city upon the island, since Nebuchadnezzar had destroyed that upon the continent; and they were become extremely rich by their industry and commerce. But the Lord meant to reject and impoverish them, and to destroy the strong holds that were built in the sea, as well as their naval force, and to burn the city with fire. This was fulfilled by Alexander. (Notes, Is. xxiii. Ez xxvi. xxvii. xxviii.) 'New Tyre 'was built on an Island, at the distance of half a mile 'from the shore: so its situation was very strong, and it 'was fortified with a wall round it one hundred and fifty 'feet high. By her merchandise she had gathered im-'mense riches. The Carthaginians were not able to as-'sist her with their naval forces.' (Lowth.) "Her "power in the sea" may signify the strength of her insular situation: and this distinguishes the Tyre taken by Alexander from that destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar. (Note, Ez. xxvi. 14.) The carnage made by Alexander, when he took Tyre, the multitudes sold for slaves, and likewise the entire desolations of the city, fix the fulfilment of the prophecy to the latter event: and the fall of Tyre must prove ruinous to Zidon.

6 And [r] a bastard shall dwell in Ashdod, and I will cut off [s] the pride of the Philistines.

7 And [t] I will take away his * blood out of his mouth, and his abominations from between his teeth: but [u] he that remaineth, even he, shall be for our God, and he shall be as [x] a governor in Judah, and Ekron as [y] a Jebusite.

8 And [z] I will encamp about mine house because of the army, [a] because of him that passeth by, and because of him that returneth: and [b] no oppressor shall pass through them any more: [c] for now have I seen with mine eyes.

9 ¶ [d] Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem: [e] behold, thy King cometh unto thee: [f] he is just, and † having salvation; [g] lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass.

10 And [h] I will cut off the chariot from Ephraim, and the horse from Jerusalem, and [i] the battle-bow shall be cut off: and [k] he shall speak peace unto the heathen: and [l] his dominion shall be from sea even to sea, and [m] from the river even to the ends of the earth.

V. 5, 6. The Philistines, having witnessed the desolations of Tyre, would be greatly alarmed and distressed, even in their capital cities. Perhaps they had hoped, that Tyre would stop the progress of Alexander's victories, and that they should have escaped: but they would be made ashamed of these expectations, and find themselves exposed without defence to the power of the conqueror. Then the king would be destroyed at Gaza; Ashkelon would be reduced to desolation; either some base person would be made ruler over Ashdod, or the city would be given to be inhabited by a colony of strangers; and thus the pride of the Philistines would be cut off. 'Gaza was taken by 'Alexander after a two months' siege; ten thousand of 'the inhabitants slain; and the governor, Betis, dragged 'round the city till he was dead. King is a general word 'for any governor. Strabo, speaking of Gaza, says, It 'was formerly a city of note, but was destroyed by Alex-'ander the Great, and remains desert and uninhabited.' (Acts viii. 16.) (Lowth.) When Gaza was thus taken and destroyed, the other cities of the Philistines fell into the hands of the conqueror, and probably experienced little favour at his hands; and especially some stranger, not a native of the country, had authority in Ashdod. 'The 'family of Israel shall dwell in Ashdod, who before were 'in it as strangers.' (Chaldee paraph.) The Maccabees conquered Ashdod: and the Philistines are not mentioned in the New Testament, but their country seems to have been possessed by the Jews.

V. 7. The Philistines and other enemies of the Jews would be deprived of their power to waste them any more: and the spoil, which they had taken by the most bloody and abominable murders, or rapines, would be torn from them, as the prey from between the teeth of a wild beast. Yet there would be a remnant, who would embrace the true religion, and become the people of God, devoted to his service: and they would be honoured even as the governors of Judah, and the inhabitants of Ekron would be privileged as a Jebusite, or a citizen of Jerusalem; as some Jebusites, whom David perhaps proselyted and incorporated among his people, when he took Jerusalem. Araunah, on whose threshing-floor David was ordered to sacrifice, and on which the temple was afterwards built, was a Jebusite; but his conduct showed the spirit of a genuine Israelite. Many Philistines might be proselyted to the Jewish religion, at or after the times of the Maccabees; but their conversion to christianity was principally intended. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. While the Macedonian conquerors were extending their ravages; and afterwards while the successors of Alexander, that reigned in Syria and in Egypt, were continually marching their armies through Judea, in their wars with each other; the Lord promised to encamp round his temple, to protect it from being plundered and destroyed: for he had seen the oppression of the Chaldeans and others, and he would watch over it, to protect it from similar depredations. Antiochus Epiphanes was permitted to profane the temple and to persecute the Jews: but this was only for a short time, and not like the desolations of the Chaldeans; and it ended in the honour of the Jews, and the disgrace and ruin of their persecutors: so that no such oppressor as Nebuchadnezzar passed through them any more; that is, till after Christ was come and rejected, when they ceased to be the people of God. But the passage no doubt refers to events yet future, which will more signally accomplish it. How can this suit the times before the captivity?

Seen, &c. 'My eye hath pervaded future events, and 'hath thus determined.' (Bp. Newcombe.) 'For I have 'well noted and pitied thy late affliction.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 9, 10. 'From the promise, contained in the fore-'going verse, of God's protecting his Church and temple, 'the prophet, in a sudden transport, takes occasion to 'break forth into a joyful representation of the coming of 'the Messias. He is righteous, and the Saviour. It is 'plain from the Gospels, that the Jews, in Christ's time, 'understood this prophecy of the Messias. For when our 'Lord applied it to himself, by entering into Jerusalem 'upon an ass, it so affected the multitude, that they spread 'their garments and palm-branches in the way: nay, 'his disciples took occasion from this sight to rejoice, and 'praise God with a loud voice.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.) All the preceding deliverances of the Jews were types of the blessings to be conferred on the Church under the reign of the Messiah, or introductory to them. The daughter of Zion was therefore called on to rejoice greatly and shout for joy, because her long expected King was about to come unto her. (Marg. Ref.) When he appeared, he would be perfectly just and holy in his character and public administration; yea, he would honour the divine law and justice in the salvation of his people. Though the most honourable and mighty of all the kings and conquerors, that ever appeared on earth, he would display none of that magnificence and grandeur, by which they generally are distinguished. On the contrary, humility and lowliness would mark his deportment; poverty and outward meanness his circumstances; and contempt and insult would be his lot on earth. On the single occasion, in which he would at all assume the character of a King; on the memorable occasion, when he would enter Jerusalem amidst the Hosannahs of the multitude, (who would soon after as loudly demand his crucifixion,) he would for once ride; not on a stately steed gorgeously caparisoned, or in a triumphal car; but on an unbroken untractable creature, an ass's colt! a proper emblem of the ungovernable nature of those over whom he came to reign; but whom his powerful grace renders submissive and obedient, even as his miraculous energy made this animal go on undismayed and guidable, amidst the clamorous joy of the surrounding multitudes. Even this ass's colt was not his own, as Man, but borrowed; nor was it fitly prepared to be ridden on, but merely with the clothes of the disciples cast loosely upon it. In every respect the divine majesty and dignity of this King were contrasted with the unexampled manner, in which he was received into the holy city that was typically the capital of his mighty kingdom. Then the Lord intended to deprive both Jews and Israelites of all carnal confidences; to terminate the contentions among such as submitted; and to destroy all the force and power of those who rebelled against him. And at the same time he would send his Gospel of peace among the heathen, reconciling them to God and to each other, and inducing them to submit to Messiah's dominion, until it should at length extend, not only all over the land, but to the utmost borders of the earth. (Marg. Ref.) 'As horses are used in war, Christ 'may be supposed by this action to have shown the humble 'and peaceable nature of his kingdom. Ephraim and 'Judah shall not engage in war to spread the Messiah's 'kingdom; but their spiritual King shall peaceably con-'vert the Gentiles, and shall extend his dominion every 'where.' (Bp. Newcombe.) The beginning of the tenth verse may be rendered, "For I will cut off, &c." Both Israel and Judah had been exceedingly prone to rely on chariots and horses: but the ruin of these confidences by the calamities of successive ages would introduce the reign of that meek and righteous King and Saviour, who would enter Jerusalem riding on an ass's colt. 'By these places, ("from sea to sea, &c.") 'the Jews knew that he meant 'an infinite space and compass over the whole world.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11. 'The prophet, speaking in the name of God, 'directs his discourse to the Church of the faithful; for 'the pronoun and affixes are feminine.' (Lowth.) 'As 'for thee, O Zion, whose covenant with me is made and 'confirmed by the precious blood of the Messiah, I do 'herein give thee a type of thy future deliverance from all 'thy spiritual miseries, in that I have brought forth thy 'captives out of the miserable captivity at Babylon.' (Bp. Hall.) 'The restoration from the Babylonish captivity, 'and the great future restoration, may both be foretold.' (Bp. Newcombe.) The bondage of Egypt, from which the Israelites were delivered by the sprinkling of the blood of the paschal Lamb; and that from which they had just been restored, were like pits or dungeons, in which was no water; where they were sinking in the mire, or perishing for want by a lingering death; and both these deliverances were granted in virtue of the engagement of Christ to shed his blood for his people. But these only shadowed forth the deliverance of sinners from the bondage of sin and Satan, and from the sentence of condemnation under which they lay: and numbers have been from age to age sent forth from their gloomy bondage in the pit where is no water, by the blood of the Redeemer's covenant; and saved from that horrible pit, where not a drop of water can be had to cool the burning tongue of those who are tormented in the flame. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. This may be considered as an address to the Jews that still remained in Chaldea: they were prisoners; yet the favour shown them by the Persian kings, and especially these promises and predictions, rendered them prisoners of hope. Let them then without delay return to Zion, as the strong-hold prepared for them; assured that God would render their prosperity double to what their adversity had been, or double to all the advantages which they could relinquish for this purpose; for he had that day solemnly declared it. Yet it is also an address to the prisoners of sin and Satan, who, having such a Saviour preached to them, may hope for liberty and felicity: let them then turn to Christ, and in him the power, truth, and love of God will be their strong-hold: and let them expect joys and comforts double both to all their sorrows, and to all their sinful pleasures. (Marg. Ref.)

Prisoners of hope. 'A beautiful address, as God when 'he doomed his people to banishment by no means totally 'rejected them.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 13—16. When Judah had been prepared by a revival of true religion to be as a bent bow in the Lord's hand; when Ephraim or the remnant of the ten tribes should be made as arrows, to fill the bow, and to be employed against his enemies; when Judas Maccabæus, and his followers the sons of Zion, should be raised up against Antiochus Epiphanes and his armies, who were of Grecian extraction, and they should become terrible as the sword of a mighty man to their oppressive assailants; then the Lord would be seen over them, as the eagle hovers over and protects her young; and his arrows would be piercing and destructive as the lightning: then he would blow the trumpet of alarm, to call the Jews to the standard, and they would bear down all before them, as the whirlwinds do in the southern deserts. While the Lord should thus defend them, they would consume their enemies, and destroy them with sling-stones, as David did Goliath: they would celebrate their victories with every expression of joy, and their exhilaration and acclamations of gratitude would be so great, that they would resemble those that make a noise through wine; and be filled with all good things, or with holy consolations, as the bowls used for the drink-offerings (or the corners of the altar into which a part of it was poured,) were with the wine. Thus the Lord would take care of them as his flock, and count them precious as the jewels of his crown, and set them up as an ensign for the Jews to flock to, who had been dispersed by the persecutions of Antiochus. Others, however, interpret the passage of the apostles and the preachers of the Gospel, in the primitive ages. They were prepared for their work, as the Lord's bow and arrows; they were raised up to oppose the idolatry, iniquity, and proud science of Greece and Rome; and they were as swords in the hand of a mighty man. Wherever they went, the Lord evidently attended them: his word from their lips, (like an arrow from the bow,) penetrated the hearts and consciences of the hearers. The blowing of the Gospel-trumpet called together increasing numbers, who, with accumulated weight, beat down before them the empire of idolatry and wickedness. They were marvellously defended, in the midst of persecuting foes by the power of God; they gained surprising victories by faith and prayer; they drank abundantly of divine consolations, and were "filled with the "Spirit" as consecrated vessels. (Eph. v. 18.) They were saved by the good Shepherd as his flock, and honoured and valued as his jewels and crown; and multitudes continually resorted to them as his ensign, to enlist as soldiers in the army of Jesus Christ. The former interpretation may very well be admitted as typical of the latter; and thus both may stand. 'Alexander the Great is called the king 'of Javan, or Greece, (Dan. viii. 21.) I will animate 'the Jews against the troops of Antiochus.' (Grotius.) 'It is true that Judas Maccabæus gained some advantages 'over the Syrians; but the language of this prophecy 'seems too strong for these events; and may remain to be 'fulfilled against the present possessors of the countries 'called Javan, which were Greece, Macedonia, and part 'of Asia minor. (Bp. Newcombe.) This may be the case, but the context favours the preceding interpretation.

V. 17. The goodness of God would appear admirable, in the protection and successes of the Jews above mentioned: but still more in the redemption of sinners by Jesus Christ, and the success of the Gospel among the benighted Gentiles. The free mercy and plenteous grace, the tender compassion and love of Christ to rebels and enemies, in the whole of his salvation, pass all knowledge; and every deep contemplation upon them must issue in admiration. At the same time his beauty, (or the excellency and glory of all the divine perfections, as harmoniously displayed in the person and work of Christ,) is equally admirable with his goodness; for, justice, holiness, truth and wisdom, are as conspicuous as mercy, in this grand concern. This therefore may be supposed to be the principal object which the prophet had in contemplation, when he thus anticipated the admiring praises of the Church in the predicted times. Yet those temporal successes may here also be considered as shadows of this spiritual redemption; and therefore the plenteous gifts, graces, and consolations of the Spirit afforded to believers of every description at and after the day of pentecost, were represented under the allusion of young persons made exceedingly cheerful by an abundance of temporal provisions: as when pinching penury is succeeded by plenty of every thing conducive to enjoyment; or as when victories are celebrated by feasts and rejoicings. (Marg. Ref.) (Notes, Cant. ii. 4, 5. v. i. Joel, ii. 28—32. Acts ii. 17, 18.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—8.

Dreadful will be the case of those on whom the burden of the word of the Lord shall rest, at that solemn season, when the eyes of all the race of men shall be fixed on him, as come to judge the world in righteousness. May our eyes now be fixed on him, in faith, hope, and love, as becomes the true Israel of God! All other wisdom will soon prove folly; all other strong-holds, except the name of the Lord, will be cast down; and all the wealth that men have gloried and confided in, will become contemptible as the mire in the street: nor will even oceans quench that fire which shall be kindled by the indignation of God. Terror, sorrow, and confusion will soon succeed to the most sanguine expectations of those whom he rejects; their dwellings will be turned to aliens, their pride will be trampled upon, and all the fruit of their abominations will be torn from them, together with the power of doing further mischief. But the remnant that is devoted to God will be safe and happy; and they shall be honoured as the governors of Judah, and as citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem. The Lord still encampeth about his Church: and whilst armies of proud opposers pass by and return, his eyes watch over her, that they cannot prevail; and shortly the time will come, when no exactor shall pass through her any more.

V. 9—17.

Let all who love the Lord rejoice with loud acclamations in Zion's King; in his majesty and meekness, in his purity and compassion, in his righteousness and salvation: and whilst we admire, and confide in his lowliness, equity, truth, and love, may we transcribe them into our own conduct. Let us "not mind high things, but condescend "to men of low estate;" and be content with poverty and mean accommodations; let us compassionate the indigent and the unworthy, and be willing and guidable in every service; lest we should be sent to learn docility and submission from the ass's colt. We should be thankful, that the Son of God came not with the weapons and the terrors of war; but with the words of mercy and peace; that being pardoned and reconciled to God, and rescued from our former usurping lords, and renouncing our carnal confidences, we may be his willing subjects, and heartily desire that his dominion may be extended throughout the earth. For through the precious blood of his covenant, the poor prisoners of Satan are set at liberty from the horrible pit, in which they must otherwise have perished without hope or comfort. And if we be thus escaped, and have our feet set upon the rock, and a new song put into our mouths, let us call to our fellow sinners, "as "prisoners of hope," to turn to the same strong-hold, assured of an abundant recompense. Sharp have been the conflicts, vast the exertions, and extensive the conquests of Zion's sons, whom the Lord hath raised up, qualified, and employed in the spiritual warfare against his proud despisers, in former ages: and whenever he thus makes any of them as polished shafts in his hand; when he animates them with courage, faith, and zeal; when he helps them to cast off the works of darkness, and to put on the armour of light; he will assuredly go with them to the combat, and give them a measure of the same success. Let us then sound the trumpet of the Gospel, and take the sling and stone of faith and prayer, the sword of the Spirit, the helmet of salvation, and the whole armour of God; and we shall be able to face any Goliath, who shall defy the armies of our Immanuel. And whilst we drink abundantly of his divine consolations, and are filled with the Spirit, we shall be joyful under every hardship, and bold in all dangers. For the good Shepherd will save his purchased flock from every wolf and lion that assaults them. He will preserve every redeemed sinner as a bright jewel in his glorious crown, and set him as an ensign, by which to bring others to enlist themselves in his armies. And the more we are employed, honoured, comforted, and satisfied with the plenteousness of his house, the more we shall admire, love, and praise his goodness and his beauty, which all heaven adores and celebrates, as revealed in the face of our Redeemer. May we "behold his glory as in "a glass, till we are gradually changed into the same "image, by the Spirit of our God."

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1. The spiritual blessings promised in the preceding chapter had been shadowed forth under allusions to temporal plenty; and the people were therefore reminded, that they must ask them from God. As rain is essential to the fruitfulness of the earth, they were directed to pray for it in its ordinary seasons: and so the Lord would make bright clouds, either such as are fore-runners of rain, or such as are bright by the lightnings which accompany it; and then every field would produce grass, or other vegetables, in plenty. This may be considered as an exhortation to the people and the preachers of the Gospel, to seek the fructifying influences of the Holy Spirit by faith and prayer, without which no means can be successful.

5 And they shall be [s] as mighty men, which [t] tread down their enemies in the mire of the streets in the battle: and they shall fight, [u] because the LORD is with them, * and the riders on horses shall be confounded.

6 And [x] I will strengthen the house of Judah, [y] and I will save the house of Joseph, and I will bring them again to place them; [z] for I have mercy upon them: and they shall be [a] as though I had not cast them off: [b] for I am the LORD their GOD, and will hear them.

7 And they of Ephraim shall be like a mighty man, [c] and their heart shall rejoice as through wine: [d] yea, their children shall see it, and be glad; [e] their heart shall rejoice in the LORD.

8 I will [f] hiss for them, and gather them; [g] for I have redeemed them: [h] and they shall increase as they have increased.

9 And I will [i] sow them among the people: and they shall [k] remember me in far countries; and they shall [l] live with their children, and turn again.

10 I will bring them again also [m] out of the land of Egypt, and gather them out of Assyria; and I will bring them [n] into the land of Gilead and Lebanon; [o] and place shall not be found for them.

11 And [p] he shall pass through the sea with affliction, and shall [q] smite the waves in the sea, and all the deeps of the river shall dry up: and [r] the pride of Assyria shall be brought down, and [s] the sceptre of Egypt shall depart away.

12 And [t] I will strengthen them in the LORD; and they shall [u] walk up and down in his name, saith the LORD.

'to idols, by putting them in mind of the calamities, 'which idolatry brought on their forefathers.' 'The 'idols are here said to speak vanity, that is, by the 'answers the priests gave in their name; for elsewhere 'they are called dumb idols.' (Lowth.) The idols of the Jews before the captivity, and their oracles, diviners, and false teachers, had deceived their expectations, imposed upon them with false doctrines and lying predictions, and given them vain and delusory comfort, by their assurances of continued prosperity. Therefore the people were driven away, like a flock of sheep by robbers, and their troubles arose for want of faithful rulers and teachers. For they who bore those characters provoked the Lord to anger by their crimes, and by leading the people into wickedness through their influence and example: and therefore he punished the goats, or the great men, who went before the people, as the he-goat before the flock. But having cut off the shepherds and the goats, the Lord had in mercy visited the remnant of the flock, and was about to renew their courage and strength for conflict and victory, even as the goodly horse is prepared for the battle. This may be applied to the success of the Jews after the captivity, under the Maccabees; or to that of Jewish preachers in spreading the Gospel. (Marg. Ref.) 'He will be mer-'ciful to his Church, and cherish them, as a king or prince 'doth his best horse, which shall be for his own use in the 'day of battle.'

V. 4. Every one that should be raised up to support the nation, as the corner-stone doth the building; or to unite discordant parties, as the nail the different timbers, must come out from the Lord, and he was to be trusted or thanked for them. Or if any should be employed to crush their enemies, their valour, helpers, and success, must come from him. This may be applied to Christ the Corner-stone and the uniting Nail of his Church, and her Protector and Ruler, who crushes all her enemies by his own power, and by the weapons which he employs. The rulers and teachers of the Church, and the preachers employed in converting the nations to Christianity, may likewise be intended.

V. 5—12. These verses are in some things similar to those considered in the former chapter: yet there are expressions, that can scarcely by applied to either of the events there mentioned. Under Judas Maccabæus the Jews became very formidable, and trode down the forces of Antiochus as the mire in the streets; and because the Lord was with them, his cavalry could not stand against them. Thus the house of Judah was strengthened and delivered, and re-established in their civil and religious privileges, and many of the dispersed Israelites were joined to them. This might also be applied to the success of the apostles and evangelists in their spiritual warfare: but what follows induces me to conclude, that the recovery of the Jews and the whole remnant of the house of Israel from their present dispersion, and future events for which that nation is reserved, were predicted; and that it can only be accommodated to any of the past affairs of the Jews or of the Church. A time is coming, when the Lord will have mercy on them and hear their prayers; he will again place them in their own land, and be as though he had not cast them off. Then power and gladness will be given to their tribes; and they and their children shall rejoice in God. He will call them together by his word, as the shepherd doth his dispersed flock by his well known whistle: he will gather them as his redeemed people, and increase them as he had done in former ages. He indeed intended to scatter them as seed through the nations of the earth; alluding to their present dispersed state, in which they are nevertheless marvellously preserved a distinct people. In this dispersion they would at length remember him, and turn again and live before him with their children: then he would bring them from the lands in which they had been in bondage and captivity, as he had of old brought them out of Egypt and Assyria, or Chaldea; and he would replace them in their own land, which would be so replenished, that room would not be found for them. At this approaching time they will experience the same marvellous protection and assistance against the enemies who oppose their return or settlement, as their fathers had done when they passed through the Red Sea from their affliction in Egypt, and through Jordan into the promised land; and all the power and pride of their antichristian assailants will be destroyed, like those of Pharaoh and Sennacherib. Thus being strengthened by the Lord, they will walk up and down in his name, trusting and rejoicing in him, and celebrating the praises of his glorious perfections and wonderful works. It can scarcely be doubted but some more signal fulfilment of this prophecy is yet to be expected; but the event alone can exactly determine, in what way the predicted deliverance will be effected. 'By Assyria 'and Egypt are meant in general the enemies of God and 'his truth; who shall all be subdued and broken in pieces 'by the kingdom of Christ.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The blessings, held forth in the promises, are actually enjoyed through faith and prayer: and the increase and success in every undertaking must be expected and sought from God alone. He forms the bright, and the black clouds, and sends both the beneficial rain, and the destructive thunder-storm: both the ministration of death, and the ministration of the Spirit and of righteousness, are from him: and he not only invites, but commands us to ask good things from him, assuring us that every one who asketh receiveth. But idols, diviners, and false teachers of every description, seduce men by lies and comfort them in vain: and when these impostors are mistaken for pastors, the flock will be scattered and troubled like "sheep "that have no shepherd." They who bear the office either of rulers or teachers, and do not their duty, but lead men from God and into sin or error, kindle his wrath against themselves and those under their care: but however he may punish degenerate professors of his Gospel and corrupt pastors, he will visit his people, and prepare them for the conflict and the victory. To the Lord we must therefore look, to raise up persons to support, cement, unite, defend, and deliver his Church: and all useful persons are the servants and instruments of Christ, from whom the stability, unity, successes, and triumphs of the Church proceed, and to whom the glory of them must be given. Such as he strengthens and attends, become mighty men, valiant for the truth, and successful in their warfare against the most formidable enemies. When he excites a spirit of prayer, even in those who seemed to be cast off, he will hear and have mercy upon them; then will he renew their comforts, and make their hearts to rejoice in him and his salvation: and he will bless them and their children after them, that they may live before him. Thus he continually calls sinners by his word, redeems them from their iniquities, and gathers them into his Church; for his chosen are scattered through the nations, and walk in evil ways, till he causes them to remember him, and to seek his salvation: then, being delivered from the bondage of sin and separated from the world, they pass through seas of affliction and temptation; by his powerful support, they are made conquerors over their inward enemies and their outward persecutors: and they shall soon pass safely through the Jordan of death to the regions of endless felicity. Let us then trust and rejoice in the Lord, and strengthen our hearts and hopes in him; and let us walk up and down this evil world, by faith in his name, and celebrating his praises: assured of being received into those blissful mansions, where there will be room found for all the innumerable multitude of those whom Jesus hath redeemed unto God with his blood.

[f] hand, according to the prophecy of Zechariah, "Open "thy doors, O Lebanon, &c." (Lowth.) This story shows, at least, what event the ancient Jews supposed to be here foretold. Lebanon may either signify the temple built of cedars from that mountain; (Marg. Ref.) or the city filled with haughty and prosperous inhabitants, and with stately mansions like the cedars of Lebanon. This must therefore be a prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple by the Romans; for there were no ravages, from the time of this prophet to that event, answerable to the expressions, and the whole context leads our thoughts to the days of Christ. In the former chapter, the future conversion of the Jews was predicted: in this, the manner by which they would be reduced to their present dispersed condition was described. After a time, the nation would fill up the measure of their iniquities; and then the country would be laid open to the Romans, and they would destroy Jerusalem and the temple, as a conflagration would devour the cedars of Lebanon. The persons of inferior power, or nations less distinguished than they, may be intended by the fir-trees and oaks of Bashan, who were ordered to howl because the cedars were fallen: Jerusalem, and the nation of Israel, had been fenced, planted, and tended as a vineyard, whence a vintage was expected; but it was become an unfruitful forest, and it would be hewn, or burned down to the ground. Or, "the defenced "forest," (Marg.) may mean Jerusalem, with its strong fortifications. The princes, priests, and scribes, would howl in madness and despair, at seeing all their honour, authority, wealth, and prosperity, torn from them: and all the principal persons would roar like enraged lions, driven from their coverts by an inundation of Jordan, when it desolated the neighbouring fields, which were as the pride of that river. For thus would the Romans expel these oppressors, when they wasted the land.

[g] V. 4—6. It is evident that the prophet performed several symbolical actions, as typical of the events predicted: but doubtless Christ was here especially intended. The Father, (whom as Man he acknowledged to be the LORD his God,) appointed him as the good Shepherd to feed the flock, just before it was given up to the slaughter. "He came to seek and save the lost;" and his personal ministry was among "the lost sheep of the house of Is-"rael." His labours, doctrines, and miracles, were calculated to reform and preserve the people: yet they eventually occasioned their ruin, and he seemed to feed them for the slaughter. Their rulers and teachers, who bore the pastoral office, deceived, oppressed, and devoured the people, without shame or remorse: nay, they boasted of their own righteousness, and hypocritically praised God for making them rich; as if he had concurred in their unmerciful oppressions! Therefore the Lord determined to show them no more pity than they had done the people: and as the nation in general was extremely corrupt, and concurred in rejecting Christ: so he would involve them in one common calamity, (except "a remnant according "to the election of grace:") and the people would both be given up to destroy one another by furious intestine dissensions, and be left in the power of the Roman emperor, whom they acknowledged as their only king, when they demanded the crucifixion of Christ their true King. (Marg. Ref.) Idolatry is not here mentioned among the sins of the Jews, in the times predicted; but covetousness and hypocrisy are specified; which, with the context, fully proves, that the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans was intended. 'He noteth the hypocrites, which have 'ever the name of God in their mouths, though in their 'life and doings they deny God! attributing their gain to 'God's blessing, which cometh of the spoil of their bre-'thren.' "Ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretence "make long prayers; therefore ye shall receive the greater "damnation." Some suppose the Romans, when selling the captive Jews for slaves, to be meant: but the language far better suits the covetous, oppressing, hypocritical scribes and pharisees. The Jews presumptuously expected, that God would deliver his worshippers, city, and temple, from the Roman idolaters: they had no prophets sent to declare the contrary, (as in the siege of the city by the Chaldeans;) and they had forgotten or explained away these ancient predictions, and scorned the warnings of Christ and his disciples. But the event, and their condition for above seventeen hundred years, have abundantly shown the fallaciousness of their hopes.

sonally, and by his apostles, would feed the flock of slaughter; but his attention would chiefly be directed to the poor of the flock, among whom a remnant would be preserved from the common ruin of the nation. Some by "the flock of slaughter," understand the poor and oppressed, who were "counted as sheep for the slaughter" by their cruel oppressors. As an emblem of this, it is probable that the prophet took two staves, such as were generally used by shepherds: one of these he called "Beauty;" by which was meant the honour, privilege, and ornament, that the Jews possessed, according to their national covenant, in the oracles, instituted worship, and temple of God: and especially by the ministry of Christ and his apostles, who preached the Gospel to them first. The other he called "Bands," denoting the connexion of the nation under one government, and the harmony that had in some measure hitherto united them, as the flock of God. (Notes, Ez. xxxvii. 14—28.) But it would soon appear, that they would not profit by the doctrine and ministry of Christ, but would choose to adhere to false teachers in preference: and he would therefore cut off three Shepherds in one month. Some explain this of the three leading sects among the Jews, the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Herodians: others, of their rulers, priests, and scribes, who were three orders of pretended shepherds, and were all degraded and cut off suddenly. 'One month 'seems a proverbial expression for a short time.' (Lowth.) They were set aside, when the apostles were commissioned and sent forth to preach: they were destroyed by the Romans, the executioners of the Lord's vengeance. For his righteous soul loathed their pride, hypocrisy, and wickedness, and they as much abhorred his holy character, doctrine, and precepts. He therefore gave them up, and would feed them no more: but left them unprotected, to destroy one another and be destroyed of their enemies; and to perish in their sins, without good instruction, or those means of grace which they had abused. 'Loathed, 'or, straitened. (Marg.) "I have a baptism to be bap-"tized with; and how am I straitened till it be accom-"plished." Or grieved. "He was moved with indig-"nation, being grieved at the hardness of their hearts."—The word, translated abhorred, is not met with elsewhere in Scripture. 'It has this sense in the Syriac.' (Bp. Newcombe.) The Septuagint renders it, "Their souls "went against me," or rushed upon me: a striking prediction of the fixed and virulent purpose of the most distinguished orders among the Jews, with all their policy, power, and influence to procure the death of Christ.—The horrid circumstance of the Jews, during the siege of Jerusalem, eating, and even quarrelling about, the flesh of their brethren and children, should not here be forgotten.

V. 10, 11. These events seem to have been prefigured, by the prophet's cutting asunder his staff, or crook, called Beauty, when he had delivered this part of the prophecy. This signified the abolition of the national covenant with Judah and Israel, who would be deprived of all those distinctions which had been their glory and beauty; which virtually took place when they rejected and crucified Christ. For then, as a nation, they ceased to be God's peculiar people, and their ordinances lost their efficacy, "waxed "old, and were ready to vanish away:" and the poor of the flock, those who waited on Christ, knew that this was the word of the Lord. They soon learned that the Jews were no longer to be the peculiar people of God, and so they separated from among them, when they saw the Roman armies about to besiege Jerusalem, being well aware of the event.

V. 12—14. This evident prophecy of a transaction recorded in the New Testament is expressed with much obscurity, as indeed might previously have been expected. It is probable that the prophet performed some symbolical action of this kind before the rulers and priests, as a type of Christ, and as showing by what means the Jews would seal their own condemnation. He demanded his wages for feeding the flock, if they thought good to give him it; and he received thirty pieces of silver, probably shekels, of about the value of half a crown or three shillings each. These the Lord directed him to cast unto the potter; disdaining that he or his shepherd should be valued at so paltry a sum: and accordingly the prophet cast them to the potter in the house of the Lord; either the potter came thither for that purpose, or he was at work near the temple. This predicted the bargain of the chief priests with Judas for that very sum, to betray Christ into their hands, the traitor's returning their money in horror of conscience, and their determining to purchase with it a potter's field to bury strangers in. Then their Shepherd brake the other staff called Bands, that he might break the brotherhood betwixt Israel and Judah; which denoted the dissolution of their civil and ecclesiastical state, and that the people would be given up to the most destructive and furious contests with each other. Some suppose that the whole was merely a vision, which the prophet reported to the people: but it is recorded as a transaction, or a direct prophecy; and not as a vision. (Notes, Hos. i.) The rulers and priests giving thirty shekels, as the wages of the prophet; the contempt thus shown to God himself; the money being thrown back by him that received it; and its eventually being given to the potter, are circumstances sufficiently strong to show, that St. Matthew does not accommodate the passage, but gives us the real meaning of the Holy Spirit in it, though some other circumstances do not coincide. And the awful and affronting nature of the messages and predictions in this chapter, and towards the close of this book, give additional weight to the opinion, that this prophet was "Zecharias the son of Barachias, "whom the Jews slew between the temple and the altar;" and his blood, the last of the innocent blood thus shed till the coming of Christ. (Note, i. 1.) The name of Jeremiah stands in our versions of the New Testament, but many learned men, on very probable grounds, are of opinion, that no name was originally in the text. "Then "was fulfilled that which was spoken by the prophet, "saying, &c." (Note, Matt. xxvii. 9.) Brotherhood, &c. 'I cannot explain this passage, without supposing, 'that the kingdom of Israel subsisted, when the prophet 'wrote it; and that the wars between Judah and Israel 'are referred to.' (Bp. Newcombe.) But do not many prophecies, allowedly written long after the captivity of the ten tribes, and predicting the times of the Messiah, thus mention Judah and Israel separately? Does not Ezekiel foretel, among other things, the final restoration of the Jews, as introduced, under the emblem of two sticks uniting in his hand, signifying, so to speak, the miraculous reunion of the staff Bands, after it had been thus broken? (Notes, Ez. xxxvii. 12—28.) And what connexion had the wars between Judah and Israel with the betraying and crucifying of Christ? The principal calamities of the race of Jacob began when they divided into two kingdoms: on their return from captivity they all formed one people: but after their rejection of Christ, internal discords, far more fierce and more speedily destructive than the wars between Judah and Israel, hastened the fatal catastrophe of the nation. This is quite sufficient for prophetical language. "The LORD said a goodly "price, &c." God was despised in the person of his prophet: but the LORD of Hosts himself also was sold for this small sum!

V. 15—17. Thus far the prophet had typified the great and good Shepherd: but now, when his people were cast off, he was ordered to take the instruments of a foolish shepherd; as an emblem of the infatuated rulers and blind guides, whom Providence would then place over the nation. From the time that they rejected Christ, and he rejected them, they would have rulers, priests, and prophets, of one sort and of one heart, (as if they had formed one shepherd,) to oppress, devour, deceive, and ruin them, both in respect of soul and body. But wo to this idol-shepherd, that left off to feed the flock, and attended to nothing but eating their flesh, and disabling them from resistance by tearing their claws to pieces. Such an one resembles a shepherd, as an idol does a deity: the idol receives the homage, oblations, and sacrifices, but disappoints the deluded worshipper to his ruin: and the idol-shepherd has the garb and appearance of a shepherd, receives submission, and is supported at much expense; but he leaves the flock to perish through his neglect, or leads them into ruin by his example. Therefore the sword of the divine vengeance would rest on his arm and right eye, to wither the one, and utterly to darken the other: for a total deprivation of power and authority, and an entire judicial blindness, would make way for his total ruin. This referred to the proud, blind, and hardened scribes, pharisees, priests, and rulers, of the Jews; and to what company of men, in any age, can either the character, or the threatened judgments on them and their successors and disciples, be applied with more exact and discriminating justice?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—11.

The admission of wickedness into communities opens a door to a fire that will consume their prosperity, however great it may be: and the tremendous doom of Jerusalem may well alarm other degenerate churches, as the fall of the cedar might cause the fir-trees and oaks of Bashan to howl. If any part of the Lord's vineyard prove an unfruitful forest, it must be cut down and cast into the fire: and those who have been pre-emient in rank and office, will have the precedency in suffering, when all their glory and pride shall be spoiled: and in such a state of the community, the best methods of reformation often excite such contempt, enmity, and opposition, that they hasten its downfal. Alas! many who possess authority in the Church, only consider what gain they can make of their situation; and whilst they fatten upon the miseries or final ruin of the flock, they are too callous to feel either remorse or pity. They follow precedents, take accustomed advantages, and keep out of the reach of human laws: and many cloak their oppression and avarice with hypocrisy, and bless God that they are rich, when their conduct proves them destitute both of piety and humanity. But the Lord leaves nations to such rulers and teachers for their sins: and it is common even for the oppressed to copy the crimes of their oppressors, till they are given up together into the hands of their neighbours and enemies, who smite and destroy them, and there is none to pity or deliver them. Yet the good Shepherd will have a flock: and he often feeds the poor in mercy, and they learn to wait on him; whilst the rich and powerful are ripening for vengeance. But he does not withdraw from favoured nations those privileges that have been their glory and beauty, till their hypocrisy and enmity to him and his cause render it necessary for him to make them examples of his awful severity. When this takes place, the criminals become of all men the most infatuated, hardened, mischievous, and miserable: and when the ordinances and oracles of God are withdrawn from those who have long abused them, the very poor of the flock will remember, that thus it was written, and that thus it must be.

V. 12—17.

Wilful contempt of Christ is the great cause of men's ruin. Alas, at how low a price do men value this precious Saviour! What sums do many lavish on those who subserve their pleasures, amusement, or decorations, and how they grudge the veriest trifle, where the edification of their own souls, or those of other men, is concerned! A trifling loss to be submitted to for conscience' sake seems a great matter: a few pieces of silver still seem to many more valuable than the unsearchable riches of Christ! And the contempt cast upon him, by putting such trifles in competition with him, or giving them the preference to his love and salvation, has in it a proportion of the same guilt which they contracted, who bribed Judas to betray him for thirty shekels; which Judas contracted, who thus sold his Lord; or which they incurred, who cried out, "Not this man, but Barabbas." He may therefore continually say unto us, "a goodly price, that I am valued "at by you!" and no wonder he disdains men's persons and services, and pours contempt on their treasures; when they prefer every worthless object to his immeasurable love. Thus Churches provoke him to withdraw his presence, and to leave them in darkness; and to give them up to "bite "and devour each other, till they are consumed one of "another;" and if professed Christians were more generally agreed in their supreme valuation of Christ, they would not in general contend so much about other matters. But when men reject his authority and salvation, they are often in judgment delivered over to follow blind guides and foolish shepherds, who are far more tremendous scourges than war, famine, and pestilence, all combined together. While such pageants and worthless idols deceive others to their ruin, they will themselves incur the deepest condemnation; and their usurped or abused authority, or pretended illumination, will end in contempt and the darkness of misery and despair: for "if the blind lead the blind, "they shall both fall into the ditch."

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1. (Marg. Ref.) This verse forms a solemn introduction to the following prophecy, and shows the vast importance of it.

V. 2—5. Some expositors consider this as predicting the victories of the Maccabees over Antiochus: but that persecutor never besieged Jerusalem: 'and the language 'is much too strong to denote the success of the Mac-'cabees.' (Bp. Newcombe.) Others apply it to the success of the first preachers of the Gospel in converting the nations, and to the judgments executed upon their opposers and persecutors. But, however it may be accommodated, some special events were doubtless intended by the Holy Spirit; and it is probable that the grand accomplishment of it is yet to be expected. It was foretold, that the Lord would make Jerusalem "a cup of trem-"bling," or a stupifying poisonous draught, to all the people round about, when they should be engaged in besieging that capital and the other cities of Judah. That is, divine judgments would immediately overtake them, as the evident effect of their attempts. Yea, he would make Jerusalem "a burdensome stone to all that should burden "themselves with it." This alludes to large stones or weights, that men used to try their strength by lifting, which sometimes proving too heavy for them, bruised, or even killed them: thus all, who attempted to injure Jerusalem, would destroy themselves, even though all the 6 In that day will I make the governors of Judah [n] like a hearth of fire among the wood, and like a torch of fire in a sheaf; and [o] they shall devour all the people round about, [p] on the right hand and on the left: and [q] Jerusalem shall be inhabited again in her own place, even in Jerusalem.

7 The LORD also shall [r] save the tents of Judah first, that the glory of the house of David, and the glory of the inhabitants of Jerusalem [s] do not magnify themselves against Judah.

8 In that day shall the LORD [t] defend the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and [u] he that is * feeble among them at that day shall be as David; and [x] the house of David shall be as God, [y] as the Angel of the LORD before them.

9 ¶ And it shall come to pass in that day, that [z] I will seek to destroy all the nations that come against Jerusalem.

10 And [a] I will pour upon [b] the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the Spirit of grace, and [c] of supplications: and [d] they shall look upon me whom they have pierced, and [e] they shall mourn for him, as one mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for him, as one that is in bitterness for his first-born.

11 In that day shall there be a great mourning in Jerusalem, [f] as the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon.

12 And [g] the land shall mourn, † every family apart; [h] the family of the house of David apart, [i] and their wives apart; the family of the house of [k] Nathan apart, and their wives apart;

people of the earth should gather themselves against it. For the Lord would smite their horses with terror and blindness, as well as the riders with madness, out of his attentive, watchful care over Judah: so that the rulers of Judah would cordially expect help from the Lord of hosts, their God, by means of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, without seeking out for any foreign succours. (Marg. Ref.) 'The former part of this chapter relates to an 'invasion made upon the inhabitants of Judea and Jeru-'salem in the latter times of the world, probably after 'their return to, and settlement in, their own land. The 'horses and their riders shall be put into such confusion, 'as to run foul of one another. (2 Kings vi. 18.) The 'marginal reading (5,) is to be preferred, "There is "strength to me, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, in "the LORD of hosts our God." 'God doth visibly inter-'pose for our deliverance, and thereby encourage us to 'rely on his protection.' (Lowth.)

V. 6—8. These verses further confirm the supposition, that the grand accomplishment of the prophecy is yet future, and that it relates to the times when the Jews shall be converted and restored to their own land. Then their governors will be like fire upon a hearth, that kindles the wood laid on it, or like a torch put to a sheaf or faggot; as they will consume all those who oppose their re-establishment in their own land; and Jerusalem will be rebuilded in its ancient situation, to be their habitation, or capital city. At the time predicted, the Lord will save the tents of Judah first. The conversion of the nation will begin among the more obscure Jews, and not among their leaders, who occupy the rank of the house of David, &c; that these may not glory over their inferiors, as if the change had been effected by their power, sagacity, or influence, or assume any improper ascendency over them: or inferior persons, from whom less is expected, will be first honoured as instruments of their deliverance and victories. At the same time, even the feeblest would resemble David in courage, faith, and grace, and be as eminent in every thing good, as that man after God's own heart had been: whilst the house of David, or their most eminent persons, would be as God, even as the Angel of the Lord, (of whom the prophet had so often spoken,) even as Christ, to go before them, and set them an example. This accords to the idea which we are taught to form of the vast abundance of spiritual gifts and grace, that shall be conferred on the people of God, at the time when this prophecy shall have its most signal accomplishment.

V. 9—14. 'God's signal interposition in behalf of 'Judah and Jerusalem, after their future restoration, 'having been foretold, the prophet proceeds to foretel 'their conversion to Christianity.' (Bp. Newcombe.) At the time when the Lord was about to destroy the enemies of the Jews, he intended to prepare them for that favour, by "pouring upon the house of David and the inhabitants "of Jerusalem," that is, both upon the rulers and common people, "the Spirit of grace and supplications." The Holy Spirit is infinitely gracious and merciful; he is most freely bestowed upon sinners; and he is the Author of all grace or holiness. He is also the Spirit of supplications; he shows them their ignorance, indigence, guilt, pollution, misery, and danger; he leads them to understand and believe the truths and promises of Scripture; and he excites hope and spiritual desires, and thus inwardly constrains them to pour out their hearts in earnest prayer. Then, (says the Speaker, JEHOVAH, who alone can give the Holy Spirit,) "they shall look on Me, whom they "have pierced." (John xix. 37.) The ancestors of that generation of Jews caused Christ to be nailed to the cross, and pierced by the soldier's spear; for they employed the Romans to execute the sentence which they had denounced, exclaiming, "his blood be on us, and on our "children!" And their posterity have ever since been consenting to this deed by their obstinate unbelief. But at the predicted period, they will know who this crucified Jesus was; and then they shall by faith look to him and mourn over him, as pierced and slain by them: this reflection will melt their hearts into extreme sorrow and compunction; they will repent of that national sin, and of all their personal transgressions, as men are used bitterly to lament the death of an only or a first-born son: for they will perceive that they had wickedly slain the Hope and Glory of their nation. This will be a general mourning of the whole people, like that which was occasioned by the death of Josiah, who was slain in the valley of Megiddon. (Marg. Ref.) All the people shall mourn with godly sorrow, which will not only be expressed in public, but in their families and in private; and even husbands and wives will separately, in retirement, give vent to their grief, and humble themselves before God for all their sins. And as their rulers, priests, scribes, and people, had concurred in the crucifixion of Christ; so all orders of men will concur in this repentance. The family of David the king, that of Nathan, the most eminent prophet in David's reign, that of Levi, or the priests and ministers of religion, and that of Shimei, who perhaps was some noted scribe, might be mentioned, as representing the different orders of men among them. A partial fulfilment of this took place, at and after the day of Pentecost, in the conversion of numbers of the Jews, who had just before crucified Christ; and it is descriptive of the conversion of sinners in every age. Yet there can be no reasonable doubt, but it is an intended prediction of the conversion of the Jewish nation, when they shall as one body embrace the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Some suppose Nathan the son of David to be meant; (12.) but then the royal house is twice mentioned, and the prophets are unnoticed, which in the Old Testament are generally considered as a distinct order. "In the margin of the English Bible we have, Or, 'of Simeon. Our translators therefore thought that the 'Hebrew text might sometimes be corrected by the 'Greek version.' (Bp. Newcombe.) This reading, however, has been added since the time of the translators, and is not found in the old copies with marginal readings.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The word of the Lord, ("who stretcheth forth the "heavens and layeth the foundation of the earth, and "formeth the spirit of man within him,") will be a heavy burden on those against whom it is sent: but it is "for Israel," and speaks peace to all true believers. Many have been the attempts of wicked men to extirpate the people of God; but they have only ruined themselves: for the Church has always proved a cup of trembling to all her assailants, and a burdensome stone to those who have burdened themselves with her; and all will assuredly be crushed or cut in pieces, who injure her, even if all the power, valour, policy, learning, wealth, and multitude of the whole earth should combine against her. Whilst the rulers and teachers of the Church expect their help and strength from the Lord of hosts their God, and use no means or instruments except such as are consecrated; his watchful eyes will ever be open to take care of them, and his arm stretched forth to protect them, and to strike their persecutors with astonishment, blindness, or madness. But it is far more desirable, when the examples, labours, and conversation of ministers and Christians render them as "an hearth of fire among the wood, or like a torch in a "sheaf;" to kindle the flame of divine love and holy affection from heart to heart, and to diffuse the influence of piety to the right hand and to the left. In the conversion of sinners, as well as in redemption, the Lord will exclude boasting, and take care that "no flesh shall glory in his "presence:" therefore not many mighty, noble, wealthy, or learned are called; and he often begins among the poor and despised families, towns, cities and nations; and then uses them as his instruments in the salvation of a remnant of the rich, the wise, and the honourable; that these may not have any ground of self-preference or contempt of others, or any pretence for assuming authority over them. —The best of men have hitherto been so very far from perfection, that it is possible for a company of believers to be called forth, the weakest of whom shall exceed the most illustrious of those who have yet been known on earth: and we are led to conclude, that this will actually be the case, in that purer state of the Church that is predicted. Then the feeblest Christian will equal David in strength of faith and vigour of affections: yet there will be rulers, teachers, and examples of such superior attainments, as to be fully qualified to go before the people in every duty and every grace. These will be followers of God as dear children, and bear the image and possess the mind of Christ to a degree of which in these lukewarm days we have scarcely any conception. Before we can expect the peculiar protection and consolation of the Lord, we must be deeply humbled for our sins. The beginning, progress, and perfection of our sanctification come from "the "pouring out of the Spirit of grace and supplications:" wherever that is granted, fervent prayer and deep humiliation will be the never-failing effects; the eyes of the mind will soon be directed in faith to him that was pierced for our sins: and whilst we condemn the conduct of him who betrayed and of those who crucified the Lord of glory, we shall not exculpate ourselves. We shall remember, that in fact our sins were the cause of the Redeemer's crucifixion; our unbelief has been a continuation of the crime of his crucifiers; our ingratitude and dishonourable conduct have often tended towards the guilt of crucifying him afresh. We may therefore all look to him whom we have pierced, and upon our sins, as the thorns, the nails, and the spear. This will increase the poignancy of our sorrow and remorse; whilst we hope for mercy through that blood which we helped to shed. When our sins are viewed in this glass, we see more cause to mourn for them, than for the loss of any earthly object; and we become inconsolable, save by the consolations of the blessed Gospel. Such godly sorrow will not be ostentatious, but will court privacy, and vent itself in secret: it will cause us to disrelish the ordinary comforts and pleasures of life: and it is equally needful to all orders of men in society; "for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God." When we are thus humbled, and yet can rejoice in the grace of the Gospel, let us pray for the out-pouring of the Spirit on the Jews and benighted heathens; that with one consent they may look to Jesus, mourn for sin, become his disciples, and partake of his grace and salvation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1. In the day mentioned at the close of the foregoing chapter, a fountain will be opened to the rulers and people of the Jews, in which to wash away their sins. This must mean the atoning blood of Christ, connected with his sanctifying grace. It began to fill, when from his pierced side flowed both blood and water: and it is not like the laver or sea of brass, in the court of the temple, which continually had need to be replenished: for it is a fountain supplied from his infinite fulness, and the infinite sufficiency of his atonement, and never diminishing, how much soever it is used. This fountain has indeed been hitherto closed with respect to the unbelieving Jewish nation: but when the Spirit of grace shall humble and soften their hearts, he will also open it to their view, and lead them to wash away their guilt and pollution in it. (Notes 2 Cor. iii. 13—16.) 'He showeth what shall be the fruit of their repentance, to wit, 'remission of sins by the blood of Christ, which shall be 'a continual running fountain, to purge them from all 'uncleanness.' When Christ was crucified, the blood and water from his pierced side were emblems of pardon through his atonement, and regeneration and sanctification by his Spirit. These blessings are signified in the Lord's supper and in baptism: but to explain this promise of either or both of them, considered as external ordinances, is palpably to mistake the sign for the thing signified, than which nothing can be more perilous.

V. 2, 3. Idolatry had before the captivity been the prevailing sin of the Jewish nation; and their false prophets had been the instruments of unclean spirits, in seducing the people into that and other abominations. But they were never addicted to gross idolatry after the days of Zechariah. That thorough reformation, however, that will take place upon their conversion to Christianity, is predicted under these allusions. Idolatry and superstition have been and are very prevalent in many parts of the Christian Church: and whilst this has formed one grand hinderance to the conversion of the Jews, it has also ensnared many of them, by inducing them to idolatrous compliances, to escape persecution: but about the time here predicted all these antichristian abominations will be terminated; and the converted Jews will watch very carefully against every appearance of such abuses. The very names and memorials of all the idols will be abolished; and the false prophets, and the unclean spirit that inspired them, will be banished, (Rev. xix. xx. 1—3:) and if any shall still presume to prophesy against the Gospel of Christ, or to promote idolatry or superstition, even their parents will strenuously oppose them, and be the first to bring them forth to punishment, according to the law of Moses. (Notes, Deut. xiii. 6—11.) They shall treat such a one in the same manner as their fathers did the true prophet, the Messias; shall pierce or thrust him through.' (Lowth.) How far the Jews may then, under a theocracy, be governed according to their judicial law, we cannot determine: but these expressions taken from it, merely denote the vigorous and decided measures that will be used to suppress these abominations, according to the nature of the dispensation under which they shall live. The universal ruin of idolatry seems also predicted. 'That gross idolatry, wherewith the world was infected, 'shall now cease; and the very names of those pagan 'idols shall now be forgotten.' (Bp. Hall.) predicted time, as well as the failure of their predictions, will put them to shame; and they will no longer wear rough garments, like those of the true prophets, in order to deceive the people: but they will disclaim the name, for fear of disgrace and punishment: declaring, that they had been brought up to other occupations, about which they meant to employ themselves: "for man hath taught me, "&c." or, "man hath possessed me," that is, as his servant. Some have thought that the abolition of the several orders of the monks and friars was here predicted; who will at length be ashamed of their distinguishing habits and pretensions to superior sanctity and miraculous powers, and will be glad to betake themselves to other employments. But perhaps it only applies to them, because they resemble the false prophets; who seem to have set for the picture which the prophet drew of future deceivers. Among those who will disavow their being prophets, some will be found "with wounds in their "hands;" which may refer to marks imprinted in their hands, as a badge of their being devoted to some idol; to the wounds that men have sometimes given themselves by voluntary austerities; or to some punishment that had been inflicted on them for their impostures. These they ascribe to other causes, as having been the effect of accident, or correction, when at home with their friends. As a most remarkable prophecy of Christ follows in the next verse, some expositors explain this also of him, and the wounds that he received in his hands when crucified. The Jews were professedly the friends of the promised Messiah, and he had acted in the most friendly manner to the nation; but they put him to death by a blind and malevolent perversion of the law, enacted against deceivers and false prophets.

V. 7. The prophet here enters on a new subject: he had been prophesying of more remote futurity; but he returns to the death of Christ, and shows what the consequence of that event would be to his people. The sword of divine justice had lain asleep, as it were, during the long season of God's forbearance, but he now commanded it to awake, in order to execute vengeance upon his Shepherd, whom he had appointed to feed his flock: it was commissioned to awake against the Man, one in human nature, the Redeemer, now considered as incarnate: yet this was no ordinary man, much less an enemy, but the Fellow, the Companion, Equal, Compeer of the Lord of hosts, the Son of the Father, "the Word that was with "God, and was God." It was to smite this Shepherd without sparing him: which may refer to the whole of Christ's sufferings, in which men and evil spirits were no more than the executioners of that wrath of God that he suffered for our sins: yet it seems especially to relate to his agonies in the garden and his exclamation on the cross, when he endured unspeakable anguish from the immediate hand of the Father, who "was pleased to bruise him and "to put him to grief," till divine justice was fully satisfied. When the Shepherd should thus be smitten for the sins of the flock, the sheep would be scattered, as the disciples were when Christ was apprehended, (Matt. xxvi. 31. 56.) and then the Lord would "turn his hand upon "the little ones;" to take care of the helpless company, that would be exposed like little children to the rage of their persecutors, when their Lord was taken from them.

V. 8, 9. In consequence of the sin of the Jews in rejecting and crucifying Christ, and in opposing his Gospel, the Romans would be employed to go through and destroy the greatest part of them, all over the land. But a remnant, a third part, would be preserved: and, after having passed through trials and afflictions, like a fiery furnace, till they were proved and refined, they would at length be converted, and be acknowledged as the people of God. This may refer to the conversion of a remnant of the Jews in the days of the apostles: but it seems also to predict, that the remnant of the nation, which should survive the havoc made of them by the Romans, after having been long preserved a distinct people, in the midst of extraordinary trials and oppressions, would at length, when "the Spirit of grace should be poured upon them," call upon the Lord in good earnest: and, being converted to Christianity, be readmitted to the privileges of his people, and taught to acknowledge him to be the Lord their God, as he is revealed to sinners in Jesus Christ.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Blessed be God, he hath prepared a fountain for the vilest and most polluted; and his Gospel invites us to wash in it and be clean. The proud and unbelieving, however, cannot discern its nature, use, or excellency. But when the heart is humbled and set against sin, the fountain is disclosed to view; and the believer daily washes in it, till his robes are made white, and he is prepared to join the glorious company before the throne of God. (Marg. Ref.) Pardon of sin is inseparably connected with genuine repentance; so that justifying faith never fails to sanctify. Thus men learn to love the truths, precepts, and ordinances of God, and to hate every false way. They forget, or abhor, their idols and iniquities; they become zealous against all impostures, by which false teachers and unclean spirits corrupt the minds of men; they thenceforth know no man after the flesh: Christ becomes more dear to them than sons or daughters; they will "contend earnestly for the "faith once delivered to the saints;" nor will they connive at their nearest relatives, who speak lies in the name of the Lord. Indeed the Christian dispensation doth not require those severities which God commanded by the Mosaic law: yet the prevalence of true religion will bring all delusions into neglect, and expose them to censure; and it will make men ashamed and afraid to publish their false visions, or impostures, by which they lie in wait to deceive. Even external mortification and apparent deadness to the world may be the cloak of ambition and hypocrisy; and rough garments may be used, as well as more pompous sacerdotal vestments, to awe men's minds into a blind deference to an antichristian deceiver: and it is desirable that false teachers should be driven from that employment to some more useful occupation; but still more that they should "repent and do works meet for repent-"ance." It can never be amiss for us to recollect the wounds in the hands and feet of the gracious Saviour. Alas, how often hath he been wounded in the house of his professed friends! Yea, by his real friends, his disciples, when, forgetful of their obligations, they have acted inconsistently with the honour of his Gospel! May we then ever remember the price which it cost him to open for us a fountain for sin and uncleanness: may we not forget the dignity of our Shepherd, as the Compeer of the Lord of hosts; nor yet the depth of his humiliation and the intenseness of his sufferings, whilst smitten by the sword of justice, when it awaked against him, that he might be punished for our sins. Thus, whilst we wash in the sacred fountain, we shall reflect with awe and gratitude on him, whose vital blood supplied the purifying stream: we shall learn to hate sin and love our Benefactor; to submit to corrections and endure persecutions; expecting to be conformed to the Redeemer by suffering in this evil world, as we hope to be in glory when we arrive at that better world above. For whilst the many neglect this great salvation to their ruin, the remnant that are saved must pass "through much tribulation into the kingdom of God;" that by these fiery trials, (as well as by the purifying fountain,) they may be refined like gold, and made meet for their Master's use and ready for every good work. But if the sharpest sufferings lead us to call upon the Lord with increasing fervency, he will hear us: and if we be his people, and he be our God, the event of our trials will be "praise, and honour, and glory, at the appearing of "our Lord Jesus Christ."

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1—3. 'The Romans, being lords of 'the known world, had the strength of all nations united in 'their forces.' (Lowth.) Half. 'The Hebrew word may 'be rendered a portion.' 'The Romans spared the young 'and useful part of the Jews. However, these were either 'condemned to the mines in Egypt, or exposed to the 'sword and to the wild beasts in the provincial theatres, 'or sold for slaves. The forty thousand, who were per-'mitted to go where they pleased, were Idumeans.' (Bp. Newcombe.) All these were "cut off from the city."—Some expositors, on this and other grounds, suppose that all the predictions of this chapter relate to events yet future; but probably they begin with the catastrophe of Jerusalem's destruction by the Romans, and so gradually extend to those events that shall hereafter take place in respect of the Jews, the Church of Christ, and their enemies. The time when the Romans marched their armies, composed of many nations, to besiege Jerusalem, was the day of the Lord Jesus, on which he came to "destroy "those that would not have him to reign over them." When the Romans had taken the city, all the outrages were committed, and the miseries endured, which are here predicted. A large proportion of the inhabitants were destroyed, or taken captives, and sold for slaves, &c. and multitudes were driven away, to be pursued by various perils and miseries; numbers, having been converted to Christianity, became citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, and thus were "not cut off from the city of God." But it is probable that the remnant of Jews, who survived this almost exterminating destruction, and their descendants, who have for so many centuries been preserved a distinct people, in order to their future restoration, are intended. (Note, xiii. 8, 9.) It is also observable, that the Romans, after having been thus made the executioners of divine vengeance on the Jewish nation, never prospered as they had done before: but the Lord evidently fought against them, and all the nations which composed their overgrown empire; till at last it was subverted, and their

V. 16—19. The feast of tabernacles was typical of Christ's dwelling in our nature as in a tabernacle; and of the Christian's contempt of the world, and joy in the Lord, as a stranger and pilgrim on earth. To keep the feast of tabernacles therefore seems to mean, that the persons intended would be converted to Christ, and join with pleasure in his ordinances, continually and with perseverance. The remnant of the nations, that had just before been fighting against Jerusalem, or the Church; the subjects of the eastern and western antichrists, and the Gentiles, will in great numbers be converted to pure Christianity, and become the spiritual worshippers and obedient servants of the Lord. But such as persist in idolatry and opposition to true religion, will be visited with drought and famine; which probably implies both temporal and spiritual judgments. And, as Egypt seldom has any rain, and another method must be taken to visit her with famine; so no situation or circumstances shall preserve any people from these judgments, who refuse to worship the Lord alone, because of their attachment to old superstitions and idolatries: they must therefore either be converted or destroyed. 'The Jews have a tradition, that the defeat of 'Gog and Magog, which seems to be the same discom-'fiture which is here described, shall fall out on the feast 'of tabernacles; or, as others say, the seven months 'cleansing of the land shall be finished at that time.' (Lowth.) In the upper parts of Egypt they seldom have any rain: but near the Mediterranean sea it sometimes rains plentifully, which is considered as a detriment, and not an advantage.

V. 20, 21. 'God's name shall be honoured in every 'circumstance.' (Bp. Newcombe.) At length the time of the complete peace and purity of the Church will arrive. Then the very bells upon the horses, or their bridles, will be inscribed with HOLINESS TO THE LORD, according to the inscription on the mitre of the high-priest. Some explain this of the war-horses; supposing it to mean, that these being disused, their ornaments will be consecrated to God. Others understand it of horses employed in common services; and suppose it to imply, that the most secular occupations will then be so conducted, that they will become holy actions performed to the glory of God. Then the pots, (either the earthen or brazen pots that were used in boiling the sacrifices, or the drinking cups of the priests,) will be as holy as the bowls before the altar had been; which may signify, that the meanest minister or Christian, (who is a spiritual priest,) will be equal to what the most eminent of God's servants formerly were; or that all their pleasures will be regulated with such moderation, and united with so much piety and gratitude, as to render them acceptable, even like solemn religious services. And this will be the case with all the pots in Jerusalem: all persons will then be thus devoted to God in their employments and satisfactions. They are likewise represented as using these pots even for sacrifices; which may mean, that the ceremonial distinction between holy and unholy will be abolished; and that men will conduct their ordinary affairs and their sacred services upon the same holy principles of faith, fear, love, and obedience. And in that day, there will be no more any Canaanite in the house of the Lord: which may mean, that mercenary ministers will no more be allowed to prostitute that sacred function; nor ungodly men to abuse holy ordinances to promote their worldly ends. For the word may be rendered a merchant; and Christ will then drive all buyers and sellers out of the temple. This happy state will continue till the end of the world. How exactly do all the prophets agree about the final event of the long continued contest betwixt the worship of the true God, and idolatry; betwixt piety, and impiety; truth, and error; holiness, and unholiness! "At the even tide it shall be "light:" and blessed be God, that season cannot be very distant.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—11.

The judgments of God commonly begin at the sanctuary. When his day of retribution comes, he can soon gather the nations together to battle against the objects of his wrath: and he needs only give them power, and their own wicked hearts will dispose them to all the enormities, which avarice, cruelty, revenge, or lust, can perpetrate. But the residue of his chosen people shall never "be cut "off from the city of our God:" and he seldom permits those to prosper who have imbrued their hands in the blood of his worshippers. The Lord of glory, by his work on earth, in our nature, and by his ascension into heaven, hath removed all obstructions to our entrance into his Church, or into the mansions of felicity; and by his Gospel he hath, as it were, sent Jerusalem's choicest privileges to these distant regions: yet, except we "flee "for refuge to lay hold on this hope set before us," we shall be no better for these advantages in that day when he shall come to judgment, and all his saints with him. Men flee without delay from an earthquake, and leave every thing behind them, "lest the earth swallow them up "also;" how should we then flee to the greatest distance from the brink of that tremendous gulph, which continually swallows up such multitudes of the ungodly! In this world the believer enjoys the light of day: yet it is attended with so many clouds and storms, that it often seems to resemble the night. He sees, but it is "through "a glass darkly:" he experiences some hope and consolation; but they are interrupted with a variety of fears, sorrows, and temptations: and his feeble beginnings of holiness are greatly counteracted and obscured by the remains and prevalency of his sinful passions. His life is therefore a strange mixture or interchange of light and darkness, and he often can scarcely tell whether it be day or night with him: yet is it one day that is known to the Lord: his faith and hope may be much enfeebled and clouded; but they are never extinguished: his Sun may be eclipsed, or hidden, but it never goes down: it may be winter with his soul, but it is never total darkness, as with those who are yet unconverted. The Lord also knows all his difficulties, discouragements, and temptations: he can distinguish between his conflicts, failures, errors, and seasons of distrust or slackness, and the total unbelief, the willing slavery and negligence of the children of disobedience: and he knows how to make all needful allowances, and to communicate proportionable supports. It often happens, likewise, that towards the evening of life the believer's light becomes more clear and abiding, and his last days his best days: and indeed his personal experience generally accords to that of the Church, whose "light will shine more and more unto the perfect "day." Let us then be thankful even for the dawning of "the Sun of righteousness" upon our souls; and let us rejoice in the hope of a clearer and more sanctifying and cheering light, towards the close of our pilgrimage; as ushering in the perfect light of the world above. The sacred streams of living waters also, that flowed from Zion, have reached our land; may we continually refresh our souls with them, amidst the varying dispensations of Providence: and may every revolution and every distress of nations make way for them to flow on, wider and deeper, till the Lord Jesus be acknowledged King over all the earth; and till all men in sincerity and peace unite in the spiritual worship and service of our God and Saviour; and all distinctions are swallowed up in the universal harmony of the nations, by the obedience of faith. When the Lord shall begin to work in answer to our prayers, every mountain shall be brought low, and every valley shall be exalted; proud Babylon shall fall, and the ruins of Jerusalem shall be repaired, and her borders enlarged, that men may dwell therein safely, and fear no curse or utter destruction for ever.

V. 12—21.

Whilst the grand revolutions predicted in this chapter shall be taking place, (and indeed at all times,) tremendous will be the plagues of all who fight against the Church: and could we see the present condition of those who have perished in this conflict, we should behold more terrible things, than if we witnessed men's "flesh consuming as "they stand upon their feet, their eyes consuming in their "holes, or their tongues in their mouths;" and every member of the body, that had been an instrument of unrighteousness, enduring the awful vengeance of God. Even that furious rage and malice which cause men here to plague, torment, and murder each other, are faint shadows of the perfect mutual enmity that reigns universally among the whole multitude of those that have perished in their sins. But every judgment of God on his enemies will tend to enrich and profit his believing people; his all-powerful grace speedily converts, and his plenteous mercy pardons and reconciles, even those who have just before been fighting against him; and they learn to rejoice in his worship and service. But how distinguishing is that grace which thus saves some of his enemies, at the moment when he consigns others to destruction! Yet no unbelievers can escape, how long soever they be borne with: every sinner must either be reconciled to God, or fall before him; for "his hand will find out all his ene-"mies, and he will make them as a fiery oven in the day "of his wrath;" nor can any man evade his vengeance, who doth not come to him, worship him, and rejoice before him. The more the Church is weaned from the beggarly elements of external distinctions and relative sanctity, the more will she be replenished with real holiness. Every action and every enjoyment of the believer ought to be so regulated according to the truth and will of God, and directed to his glory, that it may be holiness to him. Our whole lives ought to be as one constant sacrifice or act of devotion: no selfish or mercenary motive should prevail in any of our actions, any more than a Canaanite should enter into the house of the Lord. Alas, how far are we from this perfection! How far is the Christian Church from this state of purity! How are her sacred functions made subservient to the avarice, ambition, and lusts of men! How are her ordinances profaned to secular and mercenary purposes! How are our lives defiled by low and selfish pursuits, and our duties tainted by wrong motives! But times of greater purity are at hand, and the Lord will come speedily to reform and enlarge his Church, as he hath promised. Yet in heaven alone will perfect knowledge, holiness, and felicity be found.

12 But [l] ye have profaned it, in that ye say, [k] The table of the LORD is polluted; and the fruit thereof, even his meat is contemptible.

13 Ye said also, [†] Behold, what a weariness is it! * and ye have snuffed at it, saith the LORD of hosts; and ye brought that which was [m] torn, and the lame, and the sick: thus ye brought an offering: [n] should I accept this of your hand? saith the LORD.

14 But [o] cursed be the deceiver, † which [p] hath in his flock a male, and voweth and sacrificeth unto the LORD a corrupt thing: [q] for I am a great King, saith the LORD of hosts, and my [r] name is dreadful among the heathen.

V. 9—11. The Jews seem to have been at this time under divine rebukes; and the priests were appointed to burn incense and make intercession for the people in behalf of the nation. Let them, therefore, beseech the Lord to be gracious to Israel, according to the duty of their office: but as these judgments came upon the nation for their sins, or those into which they led the people, could they expect that God would regard their persons, or answer their prayers? For they had no love to the Lord or his service, but merely to the emoluments of the sacerdotal office: so that none of them would open the doors of the temple, or keep up the fire on the altar, or do any thing that they could help, except some extra emolument were annexed to it. God had provided sufficiently for their maintenance; but their love of filthy lucre was insatiable, and he had no pleasure in such mercenary services. He would, therefore, soon terminate that dispensation, and the priesthood which they so profaned, and deprive the nation of their idolized and abused privileges: but he would cause his name to be adored among the Gentiles all over the earth; and in every place their spiritual worship should ascend as incense and a pure offering into his presence, through the intercession of the great High Priest whom he had appointed. So that whilst the Jews, especially the priests, had despised, and would more despise, his name, it should be rendered great and honoured among the heathen, in all parts of the earth. (Marg. Ref.) "Surely the doors shall be closed against "you, neither shall ye kindle the fire of my altar in vain." (10.) (Bp. Newcombe.) Thus the verse may be considered as a prophecy of the abolition of the Levitical priesthood; and an introduction to a prediction concerning the conversion of the nations, and the spiritual priesthood, in the subsequent verse. But then the text must be altered on slender authority, and without necessity; for our version gives an important and instructive view of the subject. 'We have here a prophecy of the conversion of 'the Gentiles; and, as usual, under Jewish images.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 12—14. None of the Jews so much profaned the great name of the Lord as the priests did, who ought to have most hallowed it. They treated his sacrifices and oblations as polluted, and all the gains that regularly accrued from his service contemptible. Perhaps they thought any thing was good enough to set upon the table of shew-bread; and scorned to eat that which was removed from it, as if it had been polluted: they complained and showed by their very looks, that the services to which they were continually called were intolerably wearisome, and they snuffed with contempt at the portion of the sacrifices allotted to them by the law. They therefore allowed the people to bring blemished sacrifices; who, being also weary of these expensive institutions, readily brought such as God could not consistently accept at their hands. Indeed, if any were in reality so poor, that they could not procure the appointed sacrifices for the payment of their vows, they might be borne with: but that man would surely incur the awful curse of God, who attempted to impose on him by vain pretences, when he had a proper sacrifice, and yet paid his vow with one that was corrupt and worthless.—Even the heathens had heard so much of the power and majesty of Israel's King, that they trembled at his name, and could Israelites expect to despise it with impunity?—Animals, which must not be sacrificed in payment of a vow, might be presented as a free-will offering. (Note, Lev. xxii. 18—25.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—5.

Every difference that subsists betwixt one man and another, in outward circumstances, religious advantages, or the state of his soul, originates from the free love of God; who alone maketh one to differ from another, whatever instruments or means are employed for that purpose.—All the evil that sinners feel or fear, is the just recompense of their crimes; but all their hopes and comforts flow from the Lord's unmerited mercy. He did not choose his people because they had done good; but that they might be holy: nor did he pass others by, because they were worse by nature, or because he foresaw they would be worse; but for reasons best known to himself, and because every one of our fallen race is a vessel of wrath in himself fitted to destruction. If then "we love him, it is "because he first loved us." We all are too prone to undervalue God's mercies, and to palliate our own offences: yet if men habitually derogate from the value of the favours shown them, and excuse their inconsistent and ungrateful conduct, they give clear evidence that they want humility, faith, or love. In vain do ungodly men expect to remedy their own misfortunes, when the anger of the Lord lays their heritages waste; they may build and plant, but he will throw down and root up; if they persist in their wickedness, they will be called a people against whom he hath indignation for ever: and when the redeemed shall witness the final destruction of the wicked, they will see and acknowledge the glory of God, as displayed in their punishment, as well as in their own most free salvation.

CHAP. II.

The priests are sharply reproved for profaning the covenant made with their fathers, and neglecting their duty, 1—9: and both the priests and people for marrying strange wives, 10—12; and treacherously divorcing their former wives, 13—16; and for impiety and presumption, 17.

V. 6—14.

Whilst we are encouraged to call God our Father, let us not forget that we must evidence this relation by the temper and conduct of children. "The Spirit of adop- "tion witnesseth that we are the sons of God," when he influences us to love, honour, call on, trust, and obey him, as our Father. And when we do the things that he commands, simply and without reserve, in reverence and godly fear, we may cheerfully expect, that, as our Lord and Master, he will at last receive us with "Well done, good "and faithful servants." But if men confide in names, forms, and notions, and think themselves the children and servants of God, when they neither honour him as a Father, obey him as a Master, nor pay him homage and tribute as a King, they only render their guilt the more conspicuous. The nearer they approach to the Lord in profession, or in any sacred function, the more inexcusable is their contempt of his name: yet the most guilty are most ready to justify themselves and disdain the charge. Our services indeed are so defective and defiled, that we cannot be accepted, save of God's free mercy in Christ Jesus: yet surely we should not willingly present him any thing, except the prime of our affections, time, and talents! For if we spend our best on ourselves and the world, and only reserve the dregs for devotion, do we not offer polluted bread upon his altar? Do we not offer the lame, the sick, and blind, in sacrifice? Do we not count the table of the Lord, the throne of grace, or the sacred Scriptures, contemptible? And indeed do we not frequently worship him in such an unprepared and irreverent manner, and with such worthless heartless services, that it would fire the indignation of an earthly prince, if we approached him in the same manner? We are indeed under a dispensation of mercy: but "shall we sin on, that grace may "abound? God forbid." We may rely on his mercy for pardon as to the past; but not for an indulgence to sin in future. If there be a willing mind, it will be accepted, though the service be defective: but if any man be a deceiver, and wilfully puts the Lord off with the refuse, and expects him to accept a corrupt thing, whilst his best has been devoted to Satan and his lusts, let that man know, that he is under a curse, and that the wrath of the great King abideth on him. Alas, how greatly do avarice and selfishness prevail among professing Christians! Few, even of those that are called the ministers of Christ, will do any thing in his service, out of pure love to him, to their work, and to the souls of men. Inquiry is almost universally made about the value of the living, or the cure, or the salary annexed to the additional labour, and not about the good of souls or the interests of true godliness; and few are found prompt to those labours, however useful, where there is no prospect of either profit or credit, even though they be sufficiently provided for by other means. But the Lord hath no pleasure in such ministers, and he refuses to accept of their mercenary oblations. And whilst the sins of covetous, sensual, and ungodly men, appearing in the sacerdotal character, are bringing down judgments on the land, how can it be expected that their official prayers will induce him to be gracious to us? Though he hath superseded the Jewish priesthood, and sent his Gospel among the Gentiles; and prayers, praises, and thanksgivings, when offered through the merits and by the Spirit of Christ, in any place, are more acceptable to him, than the incense and oblations at Jerusalem were of old, yet human nature appears still the same. Men continue, as formerly, though in a different way, to profane the name of the Lord, and to pollute his table; to despise his work and his recompense as contemptible; to count his service weariness, and to express their contempt of him, in their behaviour towards every thing connected with his worship. And none are at this day more apt thus to despise the Lord, and to offer the lame and blind in sacrifice, than those who enter and continue in the ministry, not "of a willing mind, but for filthy lucre's sake." But let all, that love the Lord, pray that he would send disinterested, active, and diligent labourers into his harvest; such as will at present be content with food and raiment, and cheerfully wait till their master returns, expecting at that season "to receive a crown of glory "that fadeth not away."

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1—3. The prophet had before reproved both the priests and the people: but this message was immediately directed to the priests as a commandment from the Lord: and if they did not carefully and seriously attend to it, to glorify him by repentance and a conduct more consistent with their profession, he would send his curse on them, and even curse their temporal possessions and all their peculiar advantages; that is, he would render them uncomfortable, distressing, ensnaring, and ruinous.

4 And [i] ye shall know that I have sent this commandment unto you, [k] that my covenant might be with Levi, saith the LORD of hosts.

5 My [l] covenant was with him of life and peace; and [m] I gave them to him for the fear wherewith he feared me, and was afraid before my name.

6 The [n] law of truth was in his mouth, and iniquity was not found in his lips: [o] he walked with me in peace and equity, [p] and did turn many away from iniquity.

7 For [q] the priest's lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth: for he is [r] the messenger of the LORD of hosts.

8 But [s] ye are departed out of the way: [t] ye have caused many to * stumble at the law: [u] ye have corrupted the covenant of Levi, saith the LORD of hosts.

9 Therefore have I also [x] made you contemptible and base [y] before all the people, according as ye have not kept my ways, [z] but † have been partial in the law.

10 ¶ Have we not [a] all one father? [b] hath not one God created us? [c] why do we deal treacherously every man against his brother, [d] by profaning the covenant of our fathers?

11 Judah hath dealt treacherously, [e] and an abomination is committed in Israel and in Jerusalem; for Judah hath [f] profaned the holiness of the LORD, which ‡ he loved, [g] and hath married the daughter of a strange god.

12 The LORD will [h] cut off the man that doeth this, § the [i] master and the scholar, [k] out of the tabernacles of Jacob, [l] and him that offereth an offering unto the LORD of hosts.

Nay, he had in a measure done this already. But he meant to corrupt their seed-corn, that it should yield no crop; he would not prosper any of their labours: or he would render their posterity and the priestly family contemptible, and bring it to decay: yea, he would render them vile; as if the dung that was taken from the entrails of the sacrifices should be spread over their faces, and they covered over, and taken away to the dung-hill along with it, as refuse and loathsome. 'The maw was the priests, '(Deut. xviii. 3:) but such priests deserved only the 'dung which it contained.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 4—9. The Lord made a covenant with the tribe of Levi and the family of Aaron about the priesthood, as well as one with the nation of Israel about the land of Canaan, &c.; and afterwards one with David about the kingdom. And the Levites would know at length that God had sent these orders, that this covenant might be confirmed to them, by means of their repentance and reformation. The whole tribe of Levi and family of Aaron was here spoken of as a single person, with whom the covenant of life and peace had been made: which would be enjoyed in the favour of God and the comfort of his service. This appointment was a gracious recompense of their piety and reverential fear of God: for when this trust was committed to them, many of them were well acquainted with the law given by Moses, and ready to speak of it to the people; their worship and conversation were sincere and faithful, and free from iniquity or hypocrisy: they walked before God, as at peace with him, and as following after equity and peace with men; and they were instrumental in converting numbers from their sins to the worship and service of God. They were not mere sacrificers as their posterity had become: but they were sensible that the priest ought to be ready to speak upon any part of sacred knowledge, and, as the messenger of God, to instruct the people from his word. But their posterity had departed from this good way; they had violated the law by their conduct, and perverted it by their explications; and thus they stumbled, prejudiced, and misled the people: they had abused, and broken the covenant made with their fathers; and therefore they were rendered vile among the people, and exposed to contempt, as a worthless mercenary set of men. This was a divine judgment upon them for their sins; especially for being partial in the law, and leaving out such parts as did not suit their interest, conveniency, or inclination, or interpreting it by private regards and affections.

Fear wherewith, &c. 'As the zeal of the Levites 'against the worshippers of the golden calf, and that 'zealous act of Phinehas, mentioned Num. xxv. 'The 'Levites had forty-eight cities allotted them among the 'several tribes, that the people might more easily consult 'them.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 10—12. The prophet next addressed himself to both the priests and the people. They were all descended from Adam and Noah, as men; and from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as Israelites. They were formed by the Creator, of one nature and of one nation; yet they dealt treacherously with each other: and this they did in many respects, so as to profane that holiness, which God had put upon

Israel, by separating and consecrating them to be a holy people to himself. This holiness the Lord loved; yet they despised and profaned it, by their intercourse with idolaters in preference to their brethren. For even Judah, in Jerusalem, in the holy city, had committed an abomination, in marrying the daughters of idolaters, which were the children of an idol, and of Satan, who was worshipped in the idol; so that they became as it were sons in law to the idol and to Satan, in contempt of their consecration to JEHOVAH. But he would certainly cut off by some terrible judgment every man who did this wickedness, whether he were a teacher of the people, or one of the disciples of such an instructor, or a priest that officiated at the altar. (Marg. Ref.) "The master and the scholar." 'He that persuades and instructs others, that such mar-'riages are lawful; and he that follows such advice. The 'Hebrew reads, "He that wakes and he that answers."—'It seems to be a proverbial expression, denoting a master 'and a scholar.' (Lowth.)

V. 13—16. The clause, "This have ye done again," may be rendered, "This second thing have ye done." To make way for the strangers, whom they married, the people divorced their Jewish wives. 'This injurious 'treatment has made them fill the courts of the temple, 'even as far as the altar itself, with their lamentations, 'and importuning heaven for relief against your oppres-'sions; so that God will no more accept the sacrifices 'there offered, by those who show so little regard for 'common justice and humanity.' (Lowth.) 'The pas-'sage refers to the tears and groans of wives, divorced 'by priests, or referring to them for decisions.' (Bp. Newcombe.) Perhaps the persons concerned disliked their Jewish wives, on account of their religion. When, however, the women resorted to the temple to worship, instead of rejoicing in God, they wept bitterly around the altar, and poured out their souls in complaints of the injuries which they sustained: so that God could have no pleasure in the sacrifices, priests, and people, when such heavy charges were exhibited against them; nor could he delight in the oblations of such disconsolate worshippers, as they made their wives to be. They would indeed endeavour to deny the charge; but the Lord had been witness of their engagements to the wives, which they married in their youth, and with whom they had lived as their companions during the prime of their lives, and to whom they had covenanted to be faithful and affectionate; but of whom they grew weary; and, in violation of the most solemn engagements, at length divorced on frivolous pretences, that they might take heathen wives instead of them. For though divorces were connived at by the judicial law, yet they evidently formed a deviation from the original institution of marriage. 'The prophet puts the 'Jews in mind of the first institution of marriage, (as 'Christ did afterwards on a like occasion,) and tells them 'that God made but one man at first,' (the word rendered One is masculine,) 'and made the woman out of him; 'when he could have created more women, if he had 'pleased: to instruct men, that this was the true pattern 'of marriage, ordained for true love and individual affec-'tion, and best serving the chief end of matrimony, 'namely, the religious education of children.' (Lowth.) "The LORD God breathed into his nostrils the breath," (or spirit) "of life, and man became a living soul." But had he not "the residue of the spirit?" Was his life-giving power exhausted? And could he not have created many women for this one man, had he seen good? But he meant that a godly posterity should be trained up, which would best be done by the joint care of both parents, living together in love, and uniting their instructions, examples, and prayers, to that end; to which polygamy and divorces would have been alike unfavourable. The people were therefore called on to watch over their own spirits, that such sensual and selfish passions might not influence them to behave treacherously to the wives of their youth. For it was evident by the Lord's dealings with their nation, notwithstanding their provocations, that he "hated putting "away:" and could they expect, that he would connive at their putting away their wives without cause, when he had not put them away, though they had given him such abundant cause? 'He allowed the Jews the liberty of 'divorces, only "for the hardness of their hearts;" 'not 'that it was a thing pleasing to him. Some render the 'words, "If he hate her, let him put her away," 'that 'is, rather than use her ill. But the former sense is more 'agreeable to the scope of the place.' (Lowth.) May it not be added, that the latter sense is evidently contrary to the design of the passage, and agrees with no part of Scripture; but is the substance of those glosses and traditions, by which the scribes at length "rendered the com-"mandment of God of no effect?" The points of the original must be entirely altered, to make it capable of this sense; and these generally show how the passages were

CHAP. III.

A prediction of the Messiah's forerunner, and of the Messiah himself, to cleanse his Church and judge the wicked, 1—6. The people are warned to repent, especially of their sacrilege and proud blasphemy, 7—15. A blessing is promised understood in ancient times. "For I hate him that put-

"teth away." (Bp. Newcombe.) The Jews indeed endeavoured to cover this oppression with frivolous pretences; as one who by costly oblations attempted to cloak, or atone for, his unrepented crimes: or as if a man should cast a garment over the body of one whom he had violently slain, or the plunder that he had taken; but the Lord would not be thus imposed on. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17. The profane language of the people was as offensive to the Lord, as their impieties and injustice; for they pretended that he was most pleased with bad men. They did not prosper in their outward circumstances, as they expected; they proudly thought themselves good, and entitled to God's favour; they envied the prosperity of the wicked; and they argued, that if the Lord were a God of judgment, he would not let matters go on in this manner: so that unless he punished their enemies and prospered them, they should be ready to deny his Being, providence, or perfections. (Marg Ref.) 'The prosperity of the 'wicked implied, as they thought, either that their works 'were pleasing to God; or else that he disregarded human 'affairs, and would never call men to account for their 'actions.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—9.

They who will not lay the commandments of God to heart, to glorify him by repentance and obedience, must be exposed to his curse; and their abused temporal blessings will be mingled with bitterness, and be made an occasion of falling to them: and often men are under severe rebukes in their persons, connexions, undertakings, and possessions, and yet do not see the hand of God lifted up against them. It is a peculiar favour to be employed in the sacred ministry, and in making known to sinners the covenant of life and peace, when they who are thus engaged are themselves interested in that covenant, and when the Lord hath put his fear into their hearts, and made them eminent for faith and holiness. Such ministers will be able and ready to teach the truths and precepts of God's word with gravity and sincerity; and iniquity will not be found in their lips: they will walk with God in peace and righteousness, and turn many from iniquity, who will be their joy and crown of rejoicing in the day of Jesus Christ. But all, who sustain or desire to enter into this sacred function, must remember that the lips of a minister should be fraught with divine knowledge, brought forth from the good treasure of heavenly wisdom, stored up in the heart; that men may be induced to inquire the truth and will of God from his mouth, as the messenger of the Lord to their souls. Ministers who answer this description honour God, and he will honour them, and make them honourable before men in due time and measure. Alas, how many of those, who fill the holy office, entirely depart from this good old way! How many pervert and corrupt the precept of the law and the doctrine of the covenant, by their partial, superficial, and erroneous instructions; and cause men to stumble by their wicked examples! Such ministers therefore soon fall into contempt: the people disregard their instructions, and do not scruple to defraud them of their incomes; and sometimes even alienate that provision, which they have done so little to deserve, and so much to forfeit: and, however unjust man may be in these transactions, the Lord is evidently righteous, for "they that despise him shall be lightly es"teemed."

V. 10—17.

The selfishness and depravity of the human heart are continually striking out new channels of iniquity. Forgetful that one God hath created them, and that they are sprung from one common father, men multiply frauds and oppressions against their brethren; nay, professed Christians against their fellow Christians, profaning that sacred character to the vilest of purposes. Among other evidences of men's comparative disregard to piety, that is peculiarly worthy of notice, which arises from the marriages of professors of godliness with those who are openly irreligious. Men, who value their distinctions of rank or family, will not degrade themselves by alliances with those beneath them: yet they who profess themselves to be of Israel, and "holiness to the LORD," set so little value on this distinction, as to ally themselves with the children of his avowed enemy! This is no light matter: for he who of old determined to "cut off from the tabernacles of Jacob, "the master or scholar" who did this, will never connive at it in Christians. The Lord also notices men's behaviour in the different relations of life: he witnesses the unfaithfulness, imperiousness, and unkindness of numbers to their wives, and their violation of the vow and covenant, which they made to them before him and the congregation. He hears the prayers and complaints, and sees the tears, of those who have been thus injured; and, as he would have his children joyful in his service, he will call those to account who cause them to weep before him. The depravity of men hath rendered it necessary in civil society, to connive at deviations from the original institution of marriage: but in all our reasonings on that subject, we must revert to it. Did not he, who had "the residue of the "Spirit," create one woman, and no more, for man in paradise? and was not this designed, that with united attention both parents might bring up their posterity in the fear and service of God? Can therefore polygamy or divorces to such as feared God and spake together of him, when the righteous are separated from the wicked, 16—18.

BEHOLD, [a] I will send my messenger, [b] and he shall prepare the way before me: [c] and the LORD, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, [d] even the Messenger of the covenant, whom ye delight in: behold, he shall come, saith the LORD of hosts.

2 But [e] who may abide the day of his coming? and who shall stand when he appeareth? [f] for he is like a refiner's fire, and [g] like fuller's soap:

3 And he shall [h] sit as a refiner and purifier of silver: and he shall purify [i] the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the LORD [k] an offering in righteousness.

4 Then shall the offering [l] of Judah and Jerusalem be pleasant unto the LORD, [m] as in the days of old, and as in * former years.

5 And [n] I will come near to you to judgment; and I will be [o] a swift witness against [p] the sorcerers, and against the adulterers, and against false swearers, and against those that † oppress the hireling in his wages, the widow, and the fatherless, and that turn aside the stranger from his right, and [r] fear not me, saith the LORD of hosts.

6 For [s] I am the LORD, [t] I change not; [u] therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed.

on frivolous pretences, be reconcileable with his appointment? And dch not the imperious and unfaithful conduct of many profesed Christians, to the wives of their youth, form a perfect contrast to the love of Christ to his espoused Church? If mn would take heed to their spirits, they would find, tht their behaviour in relative life springs from base selfisness, which disregards the welfare of society and the appiness of individuals, when put in competition with te indulgence of their vile passions and unreasonable cprices, however they may cloak their violence by othe pretences. Yet we may the less wonder at their crueltyto their inferiors, when they weary God himself with thr impiety and infidelity; and when they take occasion frm his righteous rebukes to blaspheme his name, and charg him with partiality and injustice! But they who inquii in this daring manner, "Where is the God of judgmen?" will soon be answered, by his appearing to judgehe world in righteousness, and to inflict vengeance on all is enemies.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. VI—4. It is evident that the Lord himself here speaks: andie promises that he "will send his mes-"senger to prepa the way before him." Now John the Baptist, who beyd doubt was intended, prepared the way before Christ. (Notes, Is. xl. 2—8. Marg. Ref.) Then the Lord, (the san whom David called "his Lord," Ps. cx. 1;) whom the sought and expected, would come to his temple, or hisown temple, which could not be fulfilled in Christ, unls he were the Lord and Proprietor of the temple. (Not Hag. ii. 7—9.) He would come suddenly, or immdately after his forerunner had announced his approa: and this he did, when he repeatedly cast out the buyerand sellers from it, and there daily preached to the pede. He would be the Angel, or Messenger, of the covent, even the new covenant of mercy and grace, when he came to mediate. In the prospect of his coming the Jews seemed to delight. 'He is the per-'son ye delight in, whose coming is so much desired, the 'time of it being the subject of your search and inquiry, 'and the expectation of it your comfort.' (Lowth.) But who among the people would be able to abide his coming, and stand the test of his doctrine, and the trying dispensations which would attend the setting up of his kingdom? For he would resemble the refiner's fire and the fuller's soap, and no hypocrite or wicked man could abide the test. He would sit as a refiner of gold and silver, to purify his Church and the hearts of his people from all dross; and thus he would prepare a pure race of ministers and a spiritual priesthood, (instead of the corrupt and rejected tribe of Levi,) who might present before him a holy worship, as plesant to him as the services and sacrifices of the most eminent believers, in the purest times of the ancient Church.

V. 5, 6. (ii. 17.) The coming of Christ would be followed by the condemnation and punishment of the Jewish nation. He would come among them as a witness, to testify that their works were evil; and thus he would speedily convict the sorcerers, and other notorious criminals, of which the bulk of the nation at that time principally consisted, (Marg. Ref.) and then he would bring them to condign punishment. The prevalence of these and similar crimes, indeed, caused the Jews to reject Christ and his holy Gospel, and thus brought on the ruin of the nation. JEHOVAH, being immutable in his nature and purposes, would not consume the nation till the Messiah was come: but then his immutable justice, holiness, and truth, required him to punish them for their enormous wickedness. The people might indeed imagine, that in the days of the Messiah the Lord would deal with them more leniently; as if he had not continued the same holy and just God as when he gave the law; (thus many nominal Christians seem to suppose, that God, under the Gospel, is too merciful to punish sinners; or at least that he makes far more allowances for sin than formerly:) but as his immutable perfection had hitherto led him, amidst all the provocations of Israel, to perform his promises to their fathers; so the same immutable perfection would still induce him when the Messiah was come, to magnify his law, to glorify his justice, and to honour his truth and holiness, by the condign punishment of all the impenitent and unbelieving.

V. 7—12. The prophet here addressed the Jews in his own times: they copied the sins of their fathers, and proudly excused their conduct, instead of repenting and returning unto God, that he might return to them. It must be allowed to be the height of wickedness for a man to rob God; yet they had been guilty of this daring injustice; for they had not paid him their tithes and oblations, but had sacrilegiously appropriated his portion to their own use: and the whole nation was involved in this guilt, and lay under his curse for it. But let them render him that which he demanded as his portion, that the priests and Levites might have no excuse for their secularity, and thus put his truth to the trial; and their consequent prosperity should cause all the nations to admire their felicit, and the beauty and fertility of their land. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13—18. Many bold infidels and impious persons were found among the Jews, who spake stout words against God, and justified them. They thought their time and expense in his service lost: they attend his ordinances with many expressions of self-denial and humiliation, but they derived no profit from them and they concluded that those haughty rebels, who cast off all religion, and tempted God by their presumptuous wickedness, were the most prosperous and happy persons. There was, however, also a remnant of humble pious believers, who met together from time to time, that they might confer on religious subjects, animate one another to their duty, and inquire what might be done to check the progress of impiety. Of these and their pious desires and discourses, the Lord took special notice, and, as it were, kept a register. (Marg. Ref.) And he would surely preserve them as his portion and peculiar treasure: and no more suffer one of them to be lost, than a kind father would destroy his dutiful and obedient son among his inveterate enemies. So that the people, in the event seeing this, would retract their erroneous judgments, in supposing that the wicked are happy, and the righteous miserable: for they would discern a manifest difference in the condition of those that did, and those who did not, serve God. The connexion of this passage relates to the times of Christ, and the fate of the believing and unbelieving Jews: but it will be fulfilled in a far more striking manner at the day of judgment.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord Jesus prepares the sinner's heart to be his temple, by the ministry of his word, and the humiliating convictions of his Spirit: and then he speedily enters it as the precious Messenger of peace and consolation. But no hypocrite can endure his doctrine, or stand before his tribunal; and no idol or lust can maintain its ground, when he takes possession of the believer's heart. He refines his people as a purifier of silver; that he may render them zealous of good works, and make them a spiritual priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable and pleasant to the Father through him. Yet the upright Christian needs not fear the fiery trial of afflictions and temptations, in which the Saviour refines his gold: for he will take care that it shall not be more intense or durable than is needful for his good; and this trial will terminate far otherwise than that which he will make of the wicked at the last day. Then he will be a swift witness to convict them of impiety and iniquity; and their destruction will result from his unchangeable justice, even as the salvation of the righteous from his unchangeable love. We have all departed from God, and robbed him of his glory and worship; and have been guilty of inexcusable sacrilege in spending his talents on ourselves; and grosser sacrilege often brings whole nations under a curse. But let us return to God, and he will return to us: and he, who makes trial, will soon find that nothing is lost by honouring the Lord with his substance, and expending liberally in supporting his cause. Infidels and Pharisees will not believe this; but speak stout words in justifying themselves, and objecting to the divine dispensations: yet they will soon be silenced and confuted. The Lord notes the pious words of those that fear his name and seek his glory. He is graciously present when they meet to converse and pray together. He will preserve them as his jewels, when the earth shall be burned up as dross: yea, he will acknowledge them as his beloved children, who served him in the midst of a crooked and perverse world. And at the day of judgment, the different appearance of the righteous and the wicked; their different reception by the judge, and their different feelings respecting him; the different discoveries made of them, and the different places allotted to them; will make all the world retract their foolish censures, and confess that they alone were wise, honourable, and happy, who served the Lord, and trusted in him.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. In the day before-mentioned, the wrath of God would burn as an oven, or furnace, against the proud Pharisees and Sadducees, and all others who should reject Christ; and it would destroy all the wicked Jews, with their city and temple; so that no remains of them would be left in the land, or acknowledged as the people of God. The history of the siege and destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, and the unspeakable miseries of the Jews, and the unparalleled slaughter made of them by the Romans; with all the sufferings of the scattered remnant to this day, forms the best comment on this verse.—Leave them, &c. A proverbial expression for entire destruction.

V. 2, 3. Christ, is "the Sun of Righteousness." By his doctrine he discovers God, and his perfections, law, and truth to mankind; he shows the eternal world; he brings men acquainted with themselves, their sins, dangers, wants, enemies, and refuge. He is the Source of all man's righteousness for justification and sanctification: his influences render the sinner wise, holy, fruitful, and joyful. (Marg. Ref.) All the light in the Church, before his coming, was derived from the dawning of the day which his rising was to perfect. He arose at his birth, became more conspicuous in his ministry, was eclipsed at his death, shone forth brighter after his resurrection and ascension, and attained his meridian splendour, when the Jewish dispensation terminated in the destruction of Jerusalem, and the Christian dispensation was completely established. Then he shone on all the pious Jews, (iii. 16,) "and on all believers, with healing in his wings, or beams;" 'wings metaphorically for beams;' (Bp. Newcombe;) to heal their wounded consciences, their broken hearts, their spiritual maladies; and they went forth from the bondage of Satan, or the yoke of the ceremonial law, to grow up in knowledge and holiness, as calves grow strong and vigorous that are fed at the stall: and then they were made victorious and triumphant over all their wicked persecutors. The beams of this Sun have enlightened the nations, and the souls of all that fear God, ever since.

V. 4—6. 'Because the time was come, that the Jews 'should be destitute of prophets till the time of Christ; 'that they might with more fervent mind desire his 'coming, the prophet exhorteth them to exercise themselves diligently in studying the law of Moses in the 'mean season, whereby they might continue in the true 'religion, and also be armed against all temptations.'—These verses intimate that the Jews were to expect no more prophets, till the forerunner of Christ appeared among them. They were therefore to attend to the law of Moses, and wait the Messiah's coming by the light of that dispensation. At length Elijah would come, (that is, John Baptist,) to introduce that glorious and terrible day of Christ. (Marg. Ref.) And his ministry would tend to turn the hearts of the fathers with the children to the Lord, to reconcile their discordant parties, by directing them all to Christ; or restore the degenerate children to the temper of their pious forefathers, that they might be owned as their posterity. And except this change took place, the Lord would come and smite the land with a curse. With this awful sentence the Old Testament concludes.—'He shows 'eth wherein John Baptist's office should stand; in the 'turning of men to God, and joining of the father and 'children in unity of faith; so that the father shall 'turn to the religion of his son, that is, be converted to 'Christ; and the son shall embrace the faith of the true 'fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.' John Baptist, in many things, resembled Elijah, the intrepid, self-denying, and zealous reformer of Israel, in the days of Ahab. He came "in the spirit and power of Elijah," who was considered as the chief of the prophets, after Moses. 'The 'utter destruction of the Jewish nation—is here threat'ened, upon their rejecting the preaching of John Bap'tist, and refusing to hearken to his testimony concerning 'the Messias.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Behold another day is coming, far more dreadful than any that hath gone before, to all the proud, and those that work wickedness! But the Sun of Righteousness now shines, to enlighten and bless all that fear the Lord: and the more we walk in his light and bask in his beams, the sooner will our souls be healed, and the more speedily shall we grow holy, fruitful, and happy. What then will be our felicity, when we go forth from the dungeon of this world, to rejoice and grow up in his immediate presence for evermore! Then all enemies will be put under our feet, and peace and joy unutterable will be our portion. Let others then boast in the darkness of their proud reasonings, and call it illumination: but let us keep near to that sacred word, through which this Sun of Righteousness shines upon the souls of his people: and, in the way of his ordinances and commandments, let us wait with patience the hour of our release; and cheerfully expect the great and dreadful, yet delightful day, when he shall come the second time to complete our salvation. But let all men observe, that, without their hearts are turned from sin and the world to Christ, to God, to peace, and holiness, they cannot escape the curse of his broken law, or enjoy the felicity of his chosen and redeemed people.
